Early care helps adult life

THE ASSOCIATED PRESS
 Poor infants and toddlers who get high-quality child care are more apt to graduate from high school, attend college and delay having children, according to a new study released today. Researchers believe their results are the first to definitively link high-quality child care, beginning as early as 6 weeks of age, with a better adult life. "We view these results as grounds for optimism that high-quality, early childhood education can be an important ingredient in supporting young families," said Craig Ramey, a psychology, pediatrics and neurobiology professor at the University of Alabama and director of the Abecedarian Project. The project tracked 111 children from infancy through age 21, beginning in 1972. Among the findings:

 - The high-quality day-care children had higher cognitive test scores than the control group from toddler years to age 21.
 - Their academic achievement in both reading and math was higher from the primary grades through young adulthood.
 - They completed more years of education.
