Scales), a highly successful writer of detective stories. Mr. Wyke has built his house, and his life, to resemble his books. His high ceiling living room is the perfect sophisticated setting for one of those mystery tales that Wyke scoffs at and that he himself writes effortlessly. Into this lair for a perfect crime, where there are pokers for the fireplace, a pistol in a desk drawer and other such paraphernalia, Wyke has invited a young man named Milo Tindle (James Eikrem) who has just moved into a cottage in the neighborhood. Their get acquainted drinks and conversation is urbanely civilized at first. Just as Milo is beginning to enjoy himself, Wyke tells him he knows the youth is having an affair with his wife. The writer insists, however, he doesn't mind at all. In fact, he is perfectly willing to let her go and lie has a splendid idea by which they would both profit.
