Vancouver Police Offers New Hotline for Traffic Complaints

Vancouver residents can now leave a recorded message about a specific traffic concern through the Traffic Complaint Hotline, run by the Vancouver Police Department. The number to call is 360-619-4101.

"Citizens utilizing the traffic hotline will not only help the traffic division effectively deal with traffic complaints in a timely manner, it will also allow us to analyze the statistics to target high complaint areas which can then be worked on a regular basis," said Sgt. Tim Kim, who supervises the Vancouver Police Department traffic unit.

When calling the hotline, citizens should:

- Leave a detailed description of the traffic problem;
- Provide information about the exact the location where the traffic problem occurred;
- Include information about the time of day they noticed the traffic problem;

• Leave their name and a contact phone number. This is an important piece of the problem-solving process.

The Traffic Complaint Hotline provides the traffic unit with a centralized location for all traffic complaints. These complaints can then be assigned, tracked, logged and followed-up on in a much more efficient and professional manner.

Former Boxing Official Guilty

(AP)—A former youth coach and USA Boxing president has been sentenced to more than 10 years in prison after he pleaded guilty to sex abuse charges.

Jerry Dusenberry, 62, pleaded guilty last week in Multnomah County Circuit Court to criminal conduct with four separate victims.

Portland police began the investigation in 2001, when a mother of an eight-year-old said her child may have been molest-

Jerry Dusenberry

Before his arrest, Dusenberry had been a long-time member of the U.S. Olympic Committee and had served as a referee at Olympic boxing matches in L.A., Seoul, Barcelona and Atlanta.

Police say that Dusenberry had contact with thousands of children because he has worked as a volunteer and employee in many Portland-area youth groups for more than 40 years.

State Moving Death Row Inmates

(AP) — For the first time in years, death row inmates will be housed in the same building at the Oregon State Penitentiary, officials said.

The building also contains the state execution chamber.

Centralizing death row will make it easier to manage the prisoners and ensure they receive equal treatment, state corrections officials said.

Condemned prisoners had been housed in the penitentiary's Disciplinary Segregation Unit, but it has room for only 15 inmates.

There are 25 inmates on death row in Oregon, and the others have been housed in a different part of the prison, known as Administrative Segregation.

Plans call for all 25 death row inmates to move into vacant cells in the penitentiary's 196-bed Intensive Management Unit, which was opened in 1991 to isolate and control the most troublesome convicts.

Daily routines for death row inmates allow them to leave their cells for one hour a day to exercise, plus 40 minutes a day for other activities, including showering, making phone calls, writing letters and playing cards. Like general population inmates, death row inmates can purchase televisions to watch in their cells. They also are allowed to have visitors.

Portland Police are currently searching for the gunman who pulled up in a white SUV and opened fire.

Youth Advocates Promote 'Safe Summer'

Representatives for the Portland Police Bureau and several youth groups kicked off "Operation Safe Summer" last week at the Matt Dishman Community Center in northeast Portland.

The program is a citywide effort to reduce violence and problem behaviors by young people during the summer months.

The operation is a joint venture by the police bureau's Youth Crime Prevention office, the Office of Neighborhood Involvement, Multnomah County Department of Juvenile Justice, Portland Parks and Recreation, and Police Activities League.

The participating agencies will work with a number of youths during the summer months to provide fun and supervised activities.

Operation Safe Summer began in 1996 as a response to the increased gang violence in northeast Portland.

safety matters

Can you dig it?

Eager as you might be to dig right into your next landscape project, a word of caution: call first. A shovel hitting an underground power line can be every bit as dangerous as contacting an overhead line. If you're just planting some flowers or herbs, no problem. But when projects get more ambitious, like planting trees, digging holes for fence posts or installing underground sprinklers, please play it safe. Find out what lies underground and where by calling your local utility locating service at least 48 hours before you start the job. Your safety matters to us.

Call us at 1-888-221-7070, and we'll give you the number for the free utility line locating service in your area. For a copy of our safety booklet, Electricity 101, call 1-800-791-6093.
