PERSONAL TRIBUTES TO LOVED ONES

For most families deciding what to do with the created remains of a loved one is a difficult decision. Not only do many families have trouble deciding where to spread the remains, some do not feel comfortable parting with them all. The uniqueness of our memorials allow for a lasting tribute that can be placed in your garden, or in the privacy of your home.

Dear Deanna!
I'm at the point of forcing my husband to choose between his mother and me. My husband is a momma's boy and he runs for her beck and call. I think she does a lot of this on purpose to show me that she has more power. I can't take it after her last trick. She called my husband while we were in the bed to come and close her garage door. She knew we were in the bed and this is the last straw for me. Am I wrong? -- Leah; Atlanta, Ga.

Dear Leah:
You got punked. Your mother-in-law flipped the script and hid her flaws until after the wedding. Then again, you were so blindly in love with her son that you looked past her and thought you would win with a wedding ring. Obviously your husband doesn't see a problem if he hasn't stepped in. Provide examples to help your husband see your point of view without being offensive. Most importantly, stay on her good side and keep it moving.

Dear Deanna!
I'm a single parent divorcee. I met a military man online and in the Dear S.A.

Your marriage is already doomed if you go into it with a mindset of divorce and failure. The best investment you can make right now is intense marriage counseling. Be sure you're not on the rebound or marrying for the wrong reasons. If you want to know about fate, invite God into your relationship with this man and see how things turn out. As for the Online Cassanova, be sure he's the same on his feet as he is in cyberspace.

Dear Deanna!
An ex-boyfriend has resurfaced after three years and is out of a job and doing bad. Towards the end of our relationship, I was down on my luck, drinking and living with a friend. He was using me for sex, and not supporting me. I've gotten myself together. I've told him I've changed and after a dinner and some time with my family, he thinks he's back in and wants a commitment. I can't be with this needy man. Am I being cruel for not helping him or should I wait and let destiny come around? --Anonymous; Las Vegas, Nev.

Dear Anonymous:
It takes one time for a dog to bite in order to realize that it hurts. You came through the fire and now you're standing strong, tall and blessed. The pendulum of karma swings back and your ex-boyfriend is receiving exactly what he put out there. Do yourself a favor and support him from a distance with encouraging words and helpful references. Anything else will set you up for a fall and put you in the middle of his pity party.
