Dear Deanna!

My husband of three years has tried to keep me from achieving my dreams and goals. We dated for many years prior to marriage so my desires are no surprise. He has sabotaged my work by deleting files from my computer, erasing voice mail messages and losing important mail. I am going to be successful and want my husband to be a part of my success. We are both working dead end jobs but my success would free both of us. How do I fix this situation? -- Shattered Dreams; On-Line with him. Then address the con-Reader

Dear Shattered:

Your husband is jealous and doesn't want to see you succeed. He can see the big picture of your success and it is making him feel insecure because he will no longer be the big guy. You should involve your husband as much as you can and invite him to help you. This will goals faster, leave your dead www.askdeanna.com end job sooner and move forward in success together.

Dear Deanna!

I think it's disrespectful how my brother's wife pretends to be so helpless with the men in the family. My brother is a trucker and he's on the road most of the time working. She purposely calls the other husbands seeking help with her plumbing, car problems and calls to ask stupid questions. The women in the family see through her and think she's a big flirt. How do we address the problem without being viewed as "haters" or accused of jealousy? -- Tina; Charleston, S.C.

Dear Tina:

This can be handled through dialogue and communication. Address the issue with your brother first and share your plans cerns with your sister-in-law as a group. Provide solutions by giving her a directory of names, phone numbers and addresses for every problem she could possibly encounter. Lastly, each of you need to also talk to your spouse as well and issue boundaries in relations to them jumping to her every call.
