the building.

During the celebration luncheon inside, many spoke to how all of those involved in the renovation persevered in the face of a difficult and unusual project.

"It wasn't an easy thing to do," said Isaac Dixon, president of the Urban League of Portland board of directors, "but the building is absolutely beautiful, and the artistic touches on the outside are absolutely stellar."

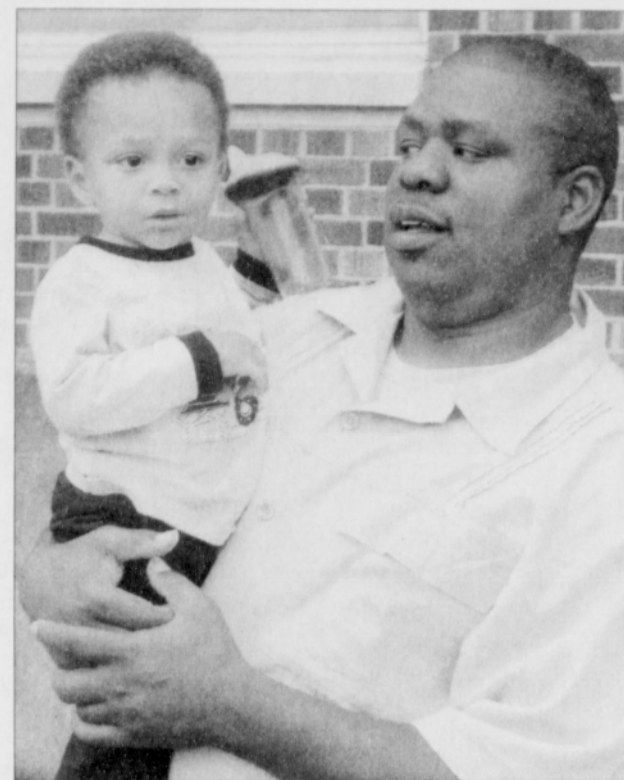

Not seeing the project as finished, the group wanted to see further improvements on the parking lot and sidewalk. There was also a call for a new tenant involved in advocacy work now that Albina Head Start was moving out of the building.

"It's a great central location, so if we could get some additional services to the community from that space, that would be great," said Fitzpatrick.

The Million Father March

Too young for school, Joshua Morris still joins his father Elmer in dropping off his older brothers at King Elementary as part of the Black Parent Initiative's "Million Father March," which seeks to bridge the achievement gap by encouraging fathers to get in the habit of dropping off their kids during the first week of school, citing research showing that children whose fathers take active roles in their educational lives earn better grades.

Sickle Cell Awareness Not just a black issue

In honor of national sickle-cell awareness month, the Sickle Cell Anemia Foundation of Oregon will hold a seminar on Saturday, Sept. 29 at Bethesda Christian Church, 109 N. Emerson.

Including genetic counseling, the most current treatment options and pain-management strategies, the OHSU-sponsored event will run from 9 a.m. to 1:15 p.m. with a $10 registration fee paying for breakfast and lunch.

Sickle-cell disease affects a primarily African-American population, but a Caucasian Portlander named Taylor Wrenn became involved with the foundation after discovering her baby's carrier status, making her at risk for episodes at high altitudes.

To raise money for more testing and events, the foundation will also hold a Saturday, Sept. 22 telethon at MetroEast Community Media, 829 N.E. Eighth, in Gresham, from 4 to 8 p.m.

For more information about the events or sickle cell, call Pastor Marcia Taylor at 503-249-1366.
