Dear Deanna!

I've fallen victim to society's double standard that pertains to dating. I'm single and have no intentions of being in a relationship because it's not on my agenda. I feel I should be able to see as many people I want without being judged. Why can men go around the world and sample everything but when women do it, we're called out of our name and everything else? --Karla; Orlando, Fla.

Dear Karla:

A man leaves his dirt in the street but a woman takes hers home. You need to be honest and see your lifestyle for what it is. You're footloose, fancy free and aren't responsible. Women are expected to behave with morals and values when it comes to dating and life in general. If you choose otherwise, as only a foolish woman will, then you deserve all the hard knocks that come your way.

Dear Deanna!

My boyfriend has been a stay-at-home dad for too long. When he lost his job I was a team player committed to keeping things together. He helps with the kids, but I still cook and clean. It's been over a year and I'm tired. We argue a lot and there's no intimacy. I'm ready to end the relationship because I see him as a lazy, trifling man and I'm not supporting him anymore. What do I do? --Anonymous; Los Angeles

Dear Anonymous:

It's too late to call him lazy and trifling because you've already had children with him and you weren't married. You should've had warning signs before now and there's no use complaining. He's not helping you financially, emotionally or spiritually so it won't matter if you're together or not. In order to save the relationship, simply demand that your freeloader get a job and pull his load or get out.

Dear Deanna!

My best friend wants me to be a bridesmaid in her wedding. I want to decline because her future husband is cheating. He's been seeing someone else the whole time he's dated my friend. I don't want to tell her because it would break her heart but I don't want her to marry him either. Do I need to go through with the wedding to make her happy or risk the friendship by telling her? --Shannon; Omaha, Neb.

Dear Shannon:

You're a lousy friend because you should be able to tell your best friend anything. You would be as guilty as the future husband if you know he's cheating but won't tell it. They're going before God with adultery on the plate and you can prevent this by being mature and doing the right thing. Pray for strength and words of wisdom as you get the facts. Tell your friend about the situation and you'll be able to sleep better at night.
