On N Mississippi Avenue African Dance Music

Njuzu Mbira will play the beautiful and traditional dance music of the Shona people of Zimbabwe in an all ages and no cover concert, Sunday, Feb. 15 from 6 to 8 p.m. at Mississippi Pizza Pub, 3552 N. Mississippi Ave.

This timeless music, performed on a metal-keyed instrument for at least 1,000 years, has been played at religious ceremonies throughout the ages and more recently incorporated into electric pop music in Zimbabwe by musicians such as Thomas Mapfumo.

Some songs played today are as old as the instrument itself. Usually two or more musicians play interlocking parts that result in layers of rhythmic melodies. Shakers (hosho) are usually played as the timekeepers. The mbiras are placed inside large calabashes for resonance. Nathan Beck and Marian Grebanier, who formed Njuzu Mbira, have studied this music since the early '90s and have spent prolonged time in Zimbabwe studying with mbira masters.

"Everything I do is collaborative. It's just my way. I'm really very interested in how the other musicians perceive the song." Cassandra Wilson
