King and Obama: Gifted Speakers

Like Dr. Rev. Martin Luther King Jr. before him, President Barack Obama has become a national leader and role model not just for the African-American community, but for the nation as a whole. Both have been formidable orators and speakers. How do they compare to each other? We asked a variety of local community leaders:

"It's hard to compare them because they're so different. It took me a little time to get used to Barack's speaking style. But our new president takes no prisoners, understands the issues we face and addresses them directly. King was very clear. The things he said decades ago are still true today. Both faced danger every time they stepped out the door." —Shirley Minor, minority contractor and political activist

"King's speeches were aspirational, forward-looking and issue-oriented; directed toward the mountain we needed to climb. Obama is someone for whom the mountain has been climbed, and we need to look toward the next mountain. King's speeches were more metaphorical. Obama is more directly concerned with the issues of the day. Both were value-centric." —Jeana Woolley, developer and consultant
