Portland Public Schools Announces Next Step in High School Redesign

After nearly a year of careful planning and efforts to muster up community support, Portland Public School's Superintendent Carole Smith laid out her plan to dramatically reshape its high school system on Monday.

Under the current system, high school students are allowed a large degree of leeway in transferring out of their neighborhood school to others. As a result, some schools end up having smaller student bodies and less funding, which leads to unequal course offerings at Portland's 13 high schools.

Smith's plan would restrict transfers, requiring more students to attend their neighborhood school, bringing more funds along with them. With more money, smaller schools would be able to offer the same courses and programs as their larger counterparts. It would also restructure the district's attendance boundaries.

The redesign of the high school system is intended to bring the same course offerings to all of Portland's high schools, close the achievement, and bring more diversity to each campus - ethnically and socio-economically.

But the plan also carries a more controversial aspect. Smith contends that the current number of students in the district and the level of funding available can't bring the same robust course offerings to all of its high schools without turning some schools into specialized magnet schools, which would have a special focus and a limited number of slots for students.

Ever since the plan was announced last year, speculation has swirled as to which school would be converted from a neighborhood school, which is often a valued community asset, to a magnet school.

On Monday, Smith revealed that next year Marshall High School in outer southeast Portland - which is home to the Renaissance Arts, BizTech and Pauling schools - would become a magnet school that could potentially partner with the neighboring David Douglas School District.

Benson Polytechnic High School, in northeast Portland, would become a specialized school open only to juniors and seniors next year, who would attend part-time pursuing technical or career-oriented pursuits.
