He also expressed concern about the police shooting of Keaton Otis, 25, who was shot by police last week during a traffic stop. His family stated recently that Otis suffered from a mood disorder. According to police accounts, Otis pulled a gun on police after becoming confrontational with officers, which led to his death.

"We have a growing problem in the Portland Police Bureau that won't go away," said Haynes, referring to mentally-fragile individuals dying at the hands of the police.

Such incidents, said Haynes, contribute to "tension and mistrust" between the police and the public.

"We still at the end of the day have an African American male with a mental health disorder dead," he said to reporters.

Haynes said that the AMA was considering doing its own independent investigation into what happened, questioning if Otis indeed had a gun.

"It is alleged that he shot at the police officer," said Haynes, arguing that the police account was not yet accepted as fact by everyone.

The AMA is also unsettled that Adams appointed East Precinct Commander Mike Reese to chief without community input.

Haynes stated that the AMA was eager to work with Reese as a partner, but was surprised that in Portland, which is known for having exhaustive processes to solicit community input on almost everything, was not used for such an important decision.

"We feel that process was circumvented," he said.
