On June 6, 2010 Emanuel C. Mosley Jr, graduated from Grant High School. This young man has overcome great obstacles. He recently accomplished a significant life hurdle, by graduating from high school. Currently national statistics indicate that young African American black males are not graduating at an escalating alarming rate, limiting their economic mobility in America. Many issues have been stated as reasons that justify why this statistic remains alarming. Among the reasons are unstable and dysfunctional home lives, along with person to person violence. Emotionally Emanuel has suffered, before the age of twelve he lost his closest male relatives (father, paternal and maternal grandfathers, and uncle) all through tragic street violence. The death of these individuals eliminated generations of men for his encouragement and created doubt in his own mortality. However, the few remaining male relatives have stepped up to the plate. Emanuel thanks his great-grandfather, George Bingham Sr., three great-grandmothers (Annie Mosley, Barbara Thomas and Surilla Simmons) along with two grandmothers (Icy and Marnella), and great uncles (Robert Coleman, Ted and Earl Martin, Aaron Mosley and George Bingham) along with others. The family knows that it certainly takes a whole village to raise a child. Emanuel plans to go to college in California and take on a career in music production.
