request from the city that he not talk to media.

Ethos currently runs two buildings on North Killingsworth Street, and has about half a million of cash on hand, according to its most recent set of tax documents. If given control of the firehouse, the non-profit has plans to go beyond music education, to offer arts programs for children and adults, partnerships with schools, multicultural arts programming, as well as serving as an incubator for minority artists.

Lewis did add that his organization has a long history of working side-by-side with other arts organizations in Portland, and is amenable to working with the other organizations that applied for the space.

"Ethos is all about collaboration," he said.

going on with the Hormans." She said Terri Horman is neither a person of interest nor a suspect.

Terri Horman's father, Larry Moulton, is staying at her house to give her support. He confirmed to KPTV that the couple's 18-month-old daughter Kiara was staying away from the house at a separate location.

"It's a very difficult time and I'm just here to support my daughter," Moulton said. "We'll leave it at that."

Earlier Monday, Kaine Horman as well as Kyron's mother Desiree Young and her husband Tony Young issued a statement through the sheriff's office that was signed only "Desiree, Tony and Kaine." It did not include Terri Horman's name.

In the statement, the three said they have been fully briefed on the investigation and support the sheriff's office.

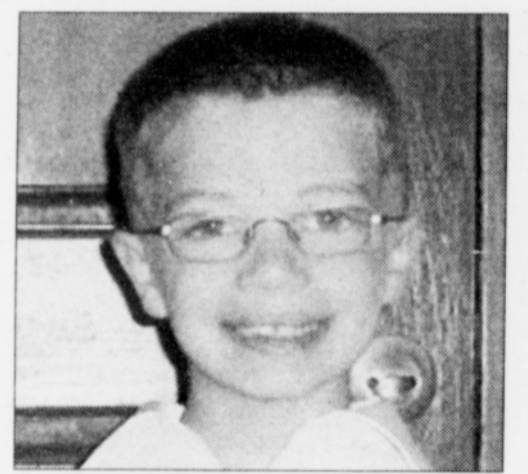

"Any actions taken by the investigation, or by us, are based on the best interests of Kyron and Kiara and comply with the law," the statement added.

Terri Horman and Kaine Horman, the father of missing 7-year-old Kyron Horman, stand together at a June 11 press conference.

Police have said Terri Horman told them she took Kyron to school on the morning of June 4. The school was having a science fair before classes began, and Terri Horman took a photo of Kyron in front of his project.

She has told police that she last saw him walking down a hallway toward his second-grade classroom, wearing a "CSI" T-shirt and dark cargo pants.
