politics are played pretty hard in the United States.

"I think we've been led to believe there is a lot more terrorism in the U.S. than there is. It's called a fear factor," she said.

Genesy Rogers

Genesy Rogers was not sure if bin Laden's death will actually change anything. She was suspect of misguided information that can be communicated to the public by the CIA.

"People are given information, but they don't really know what is going on," she said.

Because the U.S. has been fighting the War on Terrorism for almost a decade, some people question whether or not Osama Bin Laden is actually dead. Others wonder what impact the killing of a world figure-head for terrorism will mean to other nations.

Jordan Anderson sees both good and bad from the situation.

"I think it is good because it shows the American people the government will actually do what it says it will do," the local resident said. "I think it is a negative thing because it's just going to make things worse in the short-term; it will cause a spike in negativity."

"We just killed someone that for many, I'm sure, represented a hero because he stood up to the U.S.," he added.

Shayla Spencer quoted Malcolm X, "We got the king, but what about all the cubs?"

"We got him, but he was still worshipped by a lot of people," Spencer said. "We got one person, but it doesn't add up to all of the people we lost."

After Osama bin Laden's death was announced by President Obama on Sunday, a spontaneous celebration broke out in Times Square in New York City.
