Arts for All Expands Reach

Groups provide low-cost tickets to events

After a successful first year, the program Music for All has returned this fall with a new name – Arts for All – to reflect its expanded reach. Last season, 12 classical music organizations made performances more accessible to low-income citizens by offering $5 tickets to those with Oregon Trail Cards. This season, 32 arts organizations spanning disciplines such as theater, dance and music are participating in the program – almost tripling the options.

Organizations such as Oregon Symphony, Portland Baroque Orchestra, Friends of Chamber Music and Portland Youth Philharmonic provided 1,410 eligible people with the deeply discounted tickets.

"Providing opportunities for all kids and their families to experience the performing arts is at the heart of our mission," says Ross McKeen managing director of Oregon Children's Theatre. "When Music for All was launched last year, my first thought was, 'What a great idea. I wish we could be part of that.' Now, with the expansion of the program as Arts for All, we're joining our colleagues in removing barriers to access to the arts."

SNAP enrollees can buy a minimum of two tickets for $5 each to eligible events by showing their Oregon Trail Card at the time of purchase and paying with personal funds. SNAP benefits cannot be used to purchase tickets or other non-food items.

"The performing arts nourish our soul and are an important part of the shared culture for any community, but especially ours," says Mayor Sam Adams. "Participating in the arts shouldn't be out of reach for Portlanders struggling through these hard times – whether that's living on a fixed income, struggling through underemployment or the loss of a steady job. My appreciation goes out to the Portland arts organizations that have stepped up to make this program happen."

More details on all the participating organizations and the mechanism for purchasing tickets are available at artsforallpdx.org.
