Bud Clark Commons resident Jack Alexander is finally attending to his health issues now that he has escaped two decades of homelessness with a home in the new downtown apartment complex which also serves as a multi resource center.

car, her house and her job.

"I was a couch bunny," she said, referring to the plethora of couches she found herself on during cold winter nights. "I didn't have any place to call my home, except for my campsite."

She said, however, when they first gave her the key, she didn't move in for almost two months. "It is like shifting gears, and it was overwhelming," she said.

"But it has been great. I have a feeling of belonging now," she said, explaining she pays $21 to stay in her home, where her grandsons can visit whenever they please. "It has been great having them stay over."

Although Duke said they work heard every day to address people's need, she said there are still a number of people not living within their building who have to face the streets each night.

"It is not camp; it is where people live. We want to be able to respond to people's needs," she said.

New resident Jack Alexander said he feels extremely lucky to have received a home within the building after being homeless for more than two decades.

"When you're outside its hard to get yourself back up because you spend your whole life trying to survive," he said.

Although Alexander said being homeless in Portland can be easier than in other cities because of the services made available, he said he was all over the place and unable to attend to his health issues before moving to Bud Clark.

"The best part for me is the privacy, and I have a lot of medical supplies, and I finally have a place to store everything," he said. "We could use more places like this."
