working to contain the porcupines' excitement over their new digs.

"When porcupines are scared, or even when they're very excited, they will raise and fan out their quills as a defense mechanism," said Asaba Mukobi, senior Africa keeper.

The porcupines — male Sharpie and female Nolina — arrived here in August from Chicago's Brookfield Zoo. They lived in the zoo's new Veterinary Medical Center while staff renovated their habitat to accommodate them.

"We planted new trees and grass, added heating pads for the winter and created some nice new hiding areas for them," Mukobi said. "I think they'll enjoy their new home."

African crested porcupines are the largest porcupine species in the world and the largest rodents in Africa. They range from 25 to 30 inches long and can weigh more than 40 pounds. Among their distinguishing features are black-and-white quills on the neck and back that can grow up to a foot long.
