Drawing a Bridge

through the Portland Summers Project, which he considers a main priority. Efforts would include an increase in summer jobs, robust summer enrichment programs, more opportunities for internships, and things like summer computer camp.

"I think we can set a national example of this," he said. "And we need to stitch together the non-profits and organizations we already have."

Smith said his biggest competition in the race for Mayor is currently the apathy of those who choose not to vote. "But if they understand what is at stake," he said, "then we are in good shape."

"The next Mayor has to be strong," Smith said. "And there is a need for more souls of justice."

Playland 'Zany Maze' Draws Kids

rinth of hedges tall enough for children to feel hidden, but short enough for adults to see them. The exhibit also includes peek-a-boo windows, surprise passages and kooky topiaries.

"The chance to have a beautiful, interactive exhibit outside that's free and accessible to the public has been a dream of the Museum," says Sarah Orleans, Executive Director of Portland Children's Museum.

Icons from nature are hidden within for open-ended scavenger hunts, and there is a gentle grass hill with a telescope dock, benches and picnic tables.

The centerpiece of Zany Maze, however, is a beautiful Music

Tree, which is decorated with imagery from nature and bells that sing to the great outdoors.

This exciting space also functions as a changeable outdoor art gallery, with art installations made by children, for children.

Zany Maze is merely Phase I of a long-range outdoor exhibit plan for the museum. Throughout the next 18-months, Phase II will transform 46,000 square feet into a natural, inspiring, all-season exhibit for children and families.

"Because Zany Maze is free and ADA accessible, anticipation is high," says Melody Bridges, the museum's director of marketing, communications and sales. "We expect over 350,000 visitors per year will play, learn and discover in this new community space."
