Kids Cook at Farmers Market

Drop-in classes at Buckman and King sites

The International Culinary School at the Art Institute of Portland is teaming up with Portland Farmers Market again this year to offer Kids Cook at the Market, the Market's deliciously fun cooking program for young chefs-in-training. In addition to the series of classes at the Saturday PSU Market location, the program includes "bite-sized" drop-in classes at two neighborhood markets: Buckman and King Portland Farmers Markets.

Kids get cooking during classes sponsored by Portland Farmers Market and the International Culinary School.

"These programs for kids are a wonderful way to instill a life-long love of eating locally grown food!" said Trudy Toliver, executive director of Portland Farmers Market. "With the help of The International Culinary School at the Art Institute of Portland, we hope to inspire future generations of farmers, gardeners, chefs and market shoppers."

Returning for its 12th season, Kids Cook at the Market lets junior chefs age seven to eleven cultivate their culinary skills and experience a cornucopia of farm-fresh foods. At these classes, kids learn about the seasonality of food, meet local farmers and gain first-hand experience preparing ingredients purchased fresh at the market.

Classes are taught by instructors and students of The International Culinary School at the Art Institute of Portland and include a guided market tour, hands-on instruction and recipes to take home so students can share what they learn with family and friends. The classes run from 8:30 to 10 a.m. and cost $5 per child per class.

For class reservations, contact Anna Curtin at 503-241-0032 or visit portlandfarmersmarket.com.
