In addition to his success as a coach, Broadous has a strong record of sending his players on to college after they graduate, something that bodes well for players in terms of continuing their educations once their time at PCC is over.

"I think I will be a great role model for the players not only as a coach, but also as someone who used the community college route as a route to success," he said. "I am a proud representative of the community college academic and athletic systems."

Accompanying Coach Broadous to PCC will be two of his longtime assistants, Aaron Bell and Tyrone White. Like Broadous, both men grew up in North and Northeast Portland and played their high school ball here – Bell for Benson High School and White for Jefferson. The similarities don't end there – both men also played basketball in community college, Bell for Grey's Harbor Community College in Washington State, and White for Chemeketa Community College in Salem, Ore.

Broadous will be at the helm when PCC's basketball season kicks off this October.

"I want to build this program into a place where young men want to come; a place where they want to play ball and get started on their college education," Broadous said. "I want this to someplace where the team mirrors the school in terms of excellence in all areas."
