Elements from the weather have worn a protective wax coating on the George Washington Monument located at Northeast Sandy Boulevard and Alameda. A grant from the Oregon Cultural Trust will help restore the landmark.

Monument Preservation

Art, cultural groups to restore landmarks

The Regional Arts and Culture Council has received a $5,000 grant from the Oregon Cultural Trust to support general restoration of three key historic monuments in Portland's public art collection, the George Washington statue at Northeast Sandy Boulevard and Alameda, the Sacajawea and Jean-Baptiste monument at Washington Park, and the Portlandia statue on the Portland Building, downtown.

The grant will help pay for primary conservation treatments, including the removal of built-up oxidation on their bronze surfaces; hot-wax treatment to control future oxidation; and the cleaning of monument bases and pedestals.

Portlandia, the second largest hammered copper sculpture in the U.S. behind only the Statue of Liberty, will receive a complete condition assessment along with an inspection of its internal steel frame and mounts to assess the accumulation of guano and other grime due to bird infestation.

"Caring for these large scale works requires a significant investment each year," said Keith Lachowicz, public art collections manager for the Regional Arts and Cultural Council.

The total cost of the maintenance work is expected to be $12,337, and the restorations will be completed by April.

Oxidation of Sacajawea's bronze surface is beginning to take hold on the hand and face. The Washington Park monument will be restored with the support of two local arts organizations.
