When Girls Go Missing

going on," said Bart.

Florida-born Bart spent 26 years in Los Angeles as a media consultant and publicist. Through her public relations company, Helping Heroes, she represented and lent her communications expertise to politicians, entertainers, large humanitarian organizations and eventually families of missing children.

In 2008, Bart moved to Vancouver to treat an on-going medical condition. At age 17, she was diagnosed with rheumatoid arthritis and fibromyalgia. After a recent hip replacement left her on disability and depressed, she struggled to get back into the swing of things.

As she takes on the latest chapter of her life, Bart said her complaints are only relative to those of families with missing children, "These kids need a voice and these families, it's like we are their only hope."

Too often, police give up due to lack of time or resources, and faces of missing are filed with the other 56,000 cold cases that sit in the basement of the Portland Police Bureau.

"We have a dream of a world without violence and if I can play a factor in that, that's what I want to do," she said. "It's the only thing that keeps me from forgetting about me."

In 2009, Bart created her non-profit group as a way to raise awareness to a broad range of issues like domestic violence, sexual assault, stalking, bullying and hate crimes. She also sits on the advisory council for The National Center for Missing and Exploited Children.

Preventing violence against women-- kidnapping, rape and domestic violence-- starts with educating the young, she said.
