though some of his friends are not excited about coming in after school, they're learning and like helping out.

Melva Perez, another freshman at the school, says she wasn't surprised by the poor air quality findings.

"It makes sense, since this school is [almost] 100 years old," she said.

"I could just tell from the smell," said Elijah O'Shea, a sophomore.

The students are excited to find out what results the plants could yield.

The staff at Roosevelt is writing a grant proposal for $12,000 in order to expand the project next year with sophisticated electronic devices they that can monitor changes in air quality. The equipment could run them about $3,500. So far, $300 has been raised in donations.

Funding is a constant battle for teachers. To do certain projects or simply have the supplies for their students, teachers are often forced to pay out of their own pockets. Some even have taken unpaid days to conduct field trips when the school cannot afford to bring in a substitute teacher.

Jensen estimates that she and her husband have sacrificed roughly $1,000 of their own money to support student projects.

"We really feel chained by our funding," she said. "Every project and field trip comes with financial sacrifices."

The ultimate goal of the air quality project is to take their findings to the surrounding community in hopes of collaborating with Portland industries to begin working towards reducing toxic emissions in the area.

"It might take a little bit of money and a lot of support, but everybody can come together and change everything," freshmen Manny Lopez says with a smile.

Cultural Exchange

ence students from Osaka Jikei visit PCC each year to learn more about the College's programs — including the Ophthalmic Laboratory Technology program at Cascade — as well as work in PCC's labs and conduct cultural exchange with PCC students.

For his part, Gatewood had the opportunity to do a little cultural exchange of his own, visiting Osaka Jikei's facilities, meeting with its leadership, and taking in some of the myriad sights, sounds, and tastes of Osaka, Japan's second-largest metropolitan area.

"Japan is an incredible place," he said. "There's an amazing blend of tradition and modernity that you can see in everything from the cuisine to the music to the architecture. I was really impressed with Osaka Jikei's range of programs and the quality of their facilities and instruction. Their executive leadership were welcoming, cordial, and genuinely interested in broadening the perspective of their students through the relationship with PCC."

As for broadening the relationship between PCC and Osaka Jikei, Gatewood thinks it's a good idea.

"To me, international relationships such as the one with Osaka Jikei College are what we need to do if we are to successfully interface with people from around the world," he said. "And in the 21st century economy, we must be able to do this in order to be competitive."
