Speaker to Address Climate Justice

The general consensus on climate change is that significant global warming is taking place right now. But what can we expect for the rest of the 21st century and beyond?

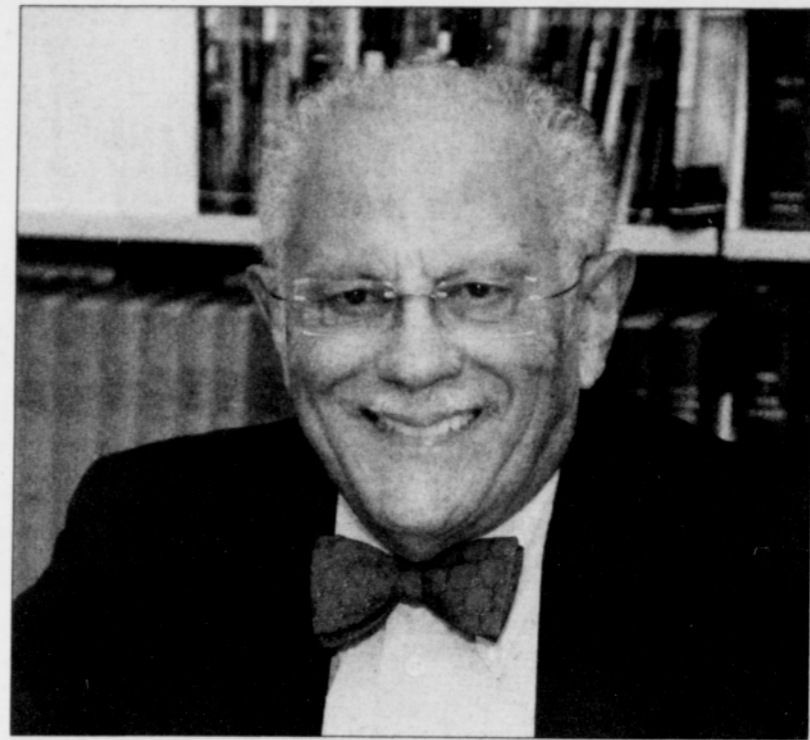

Warren Washington, a pioneer in the development of the climate models that are used to evaluate humankind's impact on the global environment, will speak on climate change, societal impacts and environmental justice on Thursday, Feb. 13 as part of the Black History Month events at Lewis & Clark College. The talk will begin at 7 p.m. at the southwest Portland school's Agnes Flanagan Chapel.

Washington grew up in northeast Portland and attended Highland Elementary and Jefferson High School.

He is a mentor and passionate supporter of individuals, educational programs, and outreach initiatives designed to foster a diverse population of atmospheric scientists.

A National Medal of Science recipient, he served appointments under the Carter, Reagan, Clinton, and G.W. Bush administrations; and is a former president of the American Meteorological Society.

Black Portlanders Celebrate

The Black Portlanders, a popular photography essay and blogsite, is celebrating its one year anniversary and the launch of an Indiegogo website. The community is invited to join the group's festivities on Saturday, Feb. 15 at 7 p.m. at the Glyph Café & Arts Space, located at 804 N.W. Couch St. in the Pearl District. You're invited to bring in portraits of black life in Portland while interacting with other amazing artists, thinkers, makers and creatives from around the city.

Tackling Issues of Literacy

Wondering how to effectively advocate for your child at their school? Looking for insight on how to build a healthy sense of racial identity for your kids?

The Black Parent Initiative invites the Portland community to an advocacy session to tackle the issues of literacy, making time for reading at home, and other issues for students of color. The event will be held Wednesday, Feb 12 at McCoy Village, 4506 N.E. Martin Luther King Jr. Blvd. Food and childcare for kids aged 3-12 are provided.
