Director Opens Window to Culture

can share, and bring people together through the characters. The audience may not be the same, but they can sit together and relate to my plays, and laugh together, which is healing.

I am called to this because I can bring the world closer, in my own way, through the stories I tell. It's important to be able to have everyone's story told.

Your play is about an African family, is that inspired by your own family?

My family definitely inspired me while I was writing this. Also, growing up in Africa. It's important, especially in America, for every culture to have a place. If you have a culture, you have a story.

American media doesn't tell our stories in the right way. They care more about the script than the people. If it serves the script, they put it in. When they talk about Africa, they put what people are used to seeing. It's lions, and wars. It's the jungle.

I tell the story the way I see it. The way I lived it. I never fought a war. The first time I saw a lion was in America. The first time I saw a gun, too.

How can people understand my culture if they don't see it the way it really is? It's family, just like their families. There's love, and struggle, and laughter. I'm telling my memories of my African family, and there are no lions in it.

*Happy Birthday Mary Brown
