POWFest puts spotlight on next generation

The Portland Oregon Women's Film Festival, also known as POWFest, opens Thursday, March 12 and runs through Sunday, March 15 at The Hollywood Theatre in northeast Portland. Tickets are $8 to $10 or $40 for a festival pass and premium access to all festival activities.

POWFest is the only film festival in Portland exclusively placing a spotlight on women directors with a goal to eliminate the gender disparity that exists for women working in the film industry.

Dedicated to creating professional development and networking opportunities for women filmmakers of every discipline and skill level, each year, the festival seeks to showcase the work of women directors from around the globe while strengthening the community of women making films; encouraging the next generation of female filmmakers.

POWGirls2015, for example, a filmmaking workshop for girls from area high schools, was successful in conceiving, writing, filming and editing two films—"Great Expectations" and "Words of Wisdom," both which will screen on Sunday, March 15 at 3 p.m.

In addition to incorporating the voices of this next generation of young filmmakers into the festival, POWFest programmers have curated a compelling line up of thought-provoking, inspiring films. A total of nearly 65 selections will screen over a period of 4 days.

As always, the schedule includes stimulating content to engage the audience through conversations with the over 45 directors in attendance; including local directors Heather Harlow, Lara Gallagher, Hope Alexander, Teresa Drilling and Janique Robillard.

Back Porch Country and Blues

Nashville's Adia Victoria - who Rolling Stone recently picked as "an artist you need to know" - brings her band to Portland for a performance Sunday, March 22 at the Aladdin Theater in southeast Portland.

A "back porch blues swamp lady howlin' at the moon" is the description this rising country star gives on her Facebook page.

Adia Victoria brings her blues and country band to Portland for a Sunday, March 22 concert at the Aladdin Theater.

Her new track entitled "Sea Of Sand" is the follow up to her debut "Stuck In The South."

Ask her about her music and she says she doesn't seek to fetishize the South as so many others do, but rather boldly and starkly sing about her experience growing up to immigrant parents in South Carolina.
