Healthy Housing Challenge

Volunteers give back to help disabled woman

A group of volunteers worked hard transforming the northeast Portland home of a low-income, disabled woman, making it easier and healthier for her to live there.

They removed excess trees and scrub brush; mowed the overgrown yard; and installed a front deck, new gutters, new washer and drier, and grab bars inside and outside so the occupant can get up and down the stairs more easily. A front door awning that had been leaking and causing dry rot was also removed.

"We got a lot of work done," said team co-captain Toby Service vice of Wells Fargo, of the May 16 event, drawing a group of Wells Fargo and rebuilding Together Portland volunteers.

Co-captain Kris Andrzejewski, also of Wells Fargo, said the resident was very excited to have the new porch and deck in the front.

"She can't do maintenance. We alleviated a lot of the yard maintenance she would have to do. That was a really big help to her," Andrzejewski said.

By the end of the day, the volunteers had filled a large dumpster to the top with debris from the yard and interior.

Wells Fargo donated $15,000 for the work as part of its support of the Healthy Housing Challenge, a joint project of the National Center for Healthy Housing, Wells Fargo and Rebuilding Together.

Strip Clubs Bust

spiring to promote illegal acts of prostitution at the businesses throughout that time. Kandace Desmarais, 63, and Gilbert "Mace" Desmarais, 50, both of Milwaukie, were both also charged with participating in the conspiracy alongside Owen.

Authorities said dancers paid the club $15 per shift, and then charged up to $160 for each 30-minute "private show" they provided. Part of that charge, $60, would go back to the business owners. Those charged would reportedly use that money to stock strip-club ATMs, and then get reimbursed for the dispensed money from out-of-state electronic fund transfers.
