Gov. Kate Brown (right) visits the Coffee Creek Correctional Facility to meet with female inmates and their children as part of a program that helps incarcerated women stay active in their children's lives.

Reaching Mothers in Custody

A local organization is helping mothers in custody stay active in their children's lives.

Called "Through a Child's Eyes," the program encourages incarcerated women to adopt pro-social behaviors, allowing mothers the chance to utilize some of the parenting skills they have been trying to rehabilitate.

Gov. Kate Brown visited Coffee Creek Correctional Facility last week to celebrate the group's annual barbeque meal where mothers and their children were allowed to interact in a more relaxed environment. The families ate together and participated in various outdoor activities.

The program, which works out of the Coffee Creek facility, is currently open to minimum and medium-custody inmates who have at least six months clean conduct and have completed a parenting education course or are currently enrolled in the class.

County Justice Employees Honored

Four parole and probation workers with Multnomah County have gone above and beyond

Erika Preuitt

Deena Corso

Truls Neal

Leticia Longoria-Navarro

in the line of duty and are being recognized for their exceptional commitment.

The American Probation and Parole Association recently acknowledged the employees, Erika Preuitt, Deena Corso, Truls Neal, and Leticia Longoria-Navarro.

Preuitt was elected to serve as president of the group, the first African-American to lead the national organization; Corso, who has been working for Multnomah County for 24 years, was elected secretary and Truls, a 25 year county employee, will serve as a regional representative for the organization.

Longoria-Navarro accepted the group's coveted Scotia Knouff Line Officer of the Year Award for her outstanding work and significant contributions to the community. She is known for her work coaching other probation officers and corrections counselors.

Congratulations to all employees recognized, and their work bridging the connections between social justice and the legal system.
