Investing in Student Leaders

Bank of America is helping five Portland students with investing in their futures, which helps develop the next generation of local leaders by recognizing community-minded high school students and connecting them to employment, professional development and service opportunities.

Yatta Barnett, Caleb Sprio, Atiya Rauf, Anayeli Diaz-Espinosa and Kayla Gadd were the dream team chosen for Bank of America's Student Leaders eight-week, paid internship program.

The students have been interning with Habitat for Humanity working on various projects from research and writing, to visiting the construction sites and learning the general operations of a non-profit.

According to a Brookings Institution report, paid youth employment programs that connect young people to education, training and the job market can be effective tools in keeping them on a trajectory for future success.

Olympics Zika Warning Risk too great for pregnant women

The Oregon Health Authority is recommending most travelers to the Olympic and Paralympic Games in Rio de Janeiro take steps during and after travel to prevent Zika infection, but advising pregnant women not to go.

Zika is a virus usually spread through bites from two types of Aedes mosquitoes, but it can spread from infected men to their partners through sexual contact. New evidence suggests that women may be able to transmit Zika to their sexual partners as well. Pregnant women are advised to not travel to the games or any Zika-affected area.

"Pregnant women should not go to any Zika-affected area because of the potential for serious effects on their babies," said Suzanne Zane, maternal and child health epidemiologist in the OHA Public Health Division. Zika can cause birth defects including microcephaly, in which the brain and head of an infant are smaller than usual.

"Even women who are not trying to get pregnant should protect themselves from Zika during travel because half of pregnancies are unplanned," Zane said.
