Innovative Educator to Visit

Innovative approaches to education and work will be the theme this week when Dr. Michael Sorrell pays a visit to Portland Community College's Cascade Campus in north Portland for an open discussion on Thursday, April 13 at 10:45 a.m. in Terrell Hall Room 122.

He will be accompanied by Michelle Harper, Portland board chair of the United Negro College Fund of Portland; Theresa Price, founder of the National College Resources Foundation; and Cynthia Adams, second vice president of the

Michael Surrell

NAACP of Oakland, Calif., all of whom will be on hand to discuss scholarship opportunities.

Dr. Sorrell has earned national renown for practices he put in place as president of Paul Quinn College, a small, private historically black liberal arts institution. Under his tenure, the school implemented a student financial structure called the "New Urban College Model" to help students pay for their education and avoid crippling levels of debt.

The event is free and open to the public.

Citizen Journalist Wins Settlement

The American Civil Liberties Union of Oregon announced Monday that a citizen journalist arrested for filming a police incident has won a settlement in a lawsuit against TriMet and the cities of Portland and Gresham.

On Feb. 12, 2013, Carrie Medina, who works at the OHSU Knight

Cancer Institute, was returning home from work, when she got off the bus and began live-streaming on her phone the images of police officers arresting a man near downtown Gresham. According to reports, an officer seized Medina's phone, twisted her arm and she was detained.

"That day I felt afraid," Medina said. "I don't think a bystander should ever feel afraid of police ... and I also felt violated." As part of the settlement Medina's $85,000 legal fees will be paid, Portland and Gresham officers will adopt new police policies and training concerning citizen's rights to film police activities.
