HOW HE WAS DISCOVERED

AMERICANS WERE FIRST TO RECOGNIZE MUNKACZY'S GENIUS.

Story of the Painter of "Christ Before Pilate," Who Died in a Swiss Insane Asylum.

The recent death of Munkaczy, the celebrated Hungarian painter, in an insane asylum at Bonn, Switzerland, has been received with much sympathy in America.

It was in this country he won that recognition of his genius that enabled him to rise from real poverty and obscurity to a commanding position in the world of art.

His two great masterpieces, "Christ Before Pilate," which is inseparably associated with his name here in America; and "Christ on Calvary," are owned by John Wanamaker.

It was Philadelphia art patron, indeed, who purchased his first great work, "Last Day of a Condemned Man," which now hangs on the walls of Memorial Hall, in Fairmount Park, east of Philadelphia.

While his great picture, "The Last Hour of Mozart," is also the property of an American, the life of Michael Munkaczy is one of the most striking of the many romances in the history of art.

He was born in Hungary in 1846, the son of a petty official in the Austrian army. His father took the patriot side under Kosuth, and the family was ruined.

The father died and Michael was adopted by a aunt who was soon after killed by a band of robbers in her own house—such was the lawless state of Hungary in those days.

An uncle next took charge of him, and at 8 years old he was apprenticed to a carpenter. He was given no education and taught himself by studying at night, by which means he nearly killed himself.

His natural bent for drawing led him to paint portraits of his peasant neighbors, and he succeeded so well at this that he determined to try his fortune in the large cities of Europe.

One art center after another he essayed in turn, but only to meet rebuff. His native talents against him. The academies everywhere shut their doors to him because of his taste for realism, not idealism or classicism.

But Munkaczy was not a man to be deterred. He went to Vienna, where he was supported only by a few of the younger men, except in Northern Germany, where a strong party had already pronounced in his favor.

He finally arrived at Dusseldorf, and there in the latter part of the year 1865, he met the two Philadelphia art connoisseurs, Mr. Wiltach and Robert Wylie, who had gone abroad for the express purpose of collecting pictures.

They found the young Hungarian carpenter, then 21 years old, at work at his trade, and in his own humble, poorly supplied atelier, painting peasant life and other subjects.

He showed them his artistic genius and the notice of the high authorities of the school founded by Cornelius, then still dominating in Germany, at once caught the attention of his patrons.

They were naturally doubtful whether a young painter could step at once from box lids and bits of genre composition, but Munkaczy's self-reliance and spirit were not daunted.

He began by preparing with his own hands the panel on which, as a carpenter, he meant to paint his picture, and that panel he made 6 feet by 4 1/2—a bigger surface, perhaps, than all the box lids he had ever painted.

Once he had made his start, the objections of his friends were turned into confidence and encouragement, and it soon became apparent that instead of a rash experiment, he was a thoroughly mature product.

He was a thoroughly mature product, thought on in detail and worked into a thrilling plot. The matter was amazing, and all agreed that Dusseldorf had not for long years seen a work so true and strong.

"Two Months Hanging and a Medal." Before the picture was completed Mr. Wiltach accepted it and paid the painter the sum agreed upon—3000 francs, a price that was most munificent.

Today it is worth at least $30,000. It is said that after the completion of the painting Munkaczy fell into a reaction of nervous despondency, and that great pressure was necessary to induce him to carry out his project of sending it to the Salon of 1857.

The encouragement of Mr. Wiltach and of his friends, however, prevailed, and the picture went to Paris. There its success was immediate. "Cham," the great caricaturist, gave it a place in his annual pamphlet on the Salon, with the legend, "M. Munkaczy, the Condemned Man—his scientific committee by the Jury to two months' hanging, and we hope, a medal."

Paris went into raptures over the discovery of a new painter. Goupil hurried to Dusseldorf and offered Munkaczy 10,000 francs for the picture, took away all
