WHAT MONEY WILL NOT BUY

Moral Drawn From Experiences of William Waldorf Astor.

Millwaukee Sentinel.

It is strange that nobody has used Mr. William Waldorf Astor's career, both in this country and in England, to point a moral. The moral is so obvious and so inspiring. Here is a man with nobody knows how many millions and an assortment of ambitions while living in New York. He goes a little way into politics, far enough to become a candidate for Congress and to get beaten. He is appointed Minister to Italy, in which pleasant country he does nothing to discredit the United States. Upon his return to his native land he tries again to break into politics, but is either downed in his tracks or thrown back for a loss. He emigrates to England, and has the following order filled at short notice: One magazine, one weekly paper, one daily paper, one town house, one country seat on the Thames. As political success was his object in America, so in England his object is social success. And the means to each end has apparently been the same—the expenditure of a great deal of money and the possession of more.

Mr. Astor's failures both at home and abroad, for by this time even he must realize that he has failed, proves that wealth cannot invariably buy everything. Except for Mr. Astor himself it is fortunate that he is exactly what he is. Had he been different the experiment would have been conducted under such conditions as to impair the value of the result. If he had been a man of great personal charm, if he had been a jolly, story-telling American, if he had been a quiet, competent host, if he had been forgetful of himself and anxious to make other persons enjoy themselves, he would probably have gratified at least his English ambition, and people would have attributed his success to his money, instead of to those personal qualities which enabled his money to do its work well. As it is, with almost nothing except money in his favor, Mr. Astor has played and lost, and moralists are at liberty to felicitate England and America upon this demonstration that there are some things which some persons cannot buy, no matter how much money they happen to have.

Protects German Industries.
Philadelphia Press.

Besides the regular patent the German laws provide, since 1881, for a so-called "musterchutz," which gives certain new articles the right of being protected against imitation for three years, and is considerably cheaper than the patent, though in effect similar to the latter. The musterchutz is essentially a protection of the home industries, no matter from where the article to be manufactured may have originated. The formalities require no oath or statement as to the origin of the invention, but merely a declaration that the article has not been offered freely on the German market.

TWO YOUNG HEROINES.
One Has Been Honored, and Other Is Equally Deserving.

Readers of The Oregonian will doubtless remember the recent heroic act of little Clara McEwan, of Portland, who saved the life of her sister Helen, and that of a boy, Ernest Stryle. By her presence of mind, in forming a living chain of children, with hand linked to hand, her sister and the boy were dragged from the waters of La Camas Lake and their lives saved.

In 1893, a little Indiana girl, Jennie Cook, then 12 years old, also did a brave deed. She flagged a railroad passenger train, fast approaching a burning bridge, with her red flannel petticoat, and saved hundreds of lives. For her heroism she was decorated with the 5-pointed gold star of the French Legion of Honor, and will become the guest of honor of the order at the Paris Exposition.

A correspondent of The Oregonian suggests that if a decoration was proper in the one case, it is equally so in the other. It is proposed that Oregon people should show their approval of Clara McEwan's deed in some suitable way.

Of the 1188 census enumerators in Chicago, 176 are women. A district superintendent is reported to have said that he regretted the number of women was not larger, as he found them keener than many of the men, and quicker in comprehending the points of the work.
