FROM FOREST TO MILL.

DUMPING LOGS AT TIDEWATER.

Banking Logs.

In the foreground of Oregon, where will you find the largest forested area? It is in the region of the Coos Range, where the forest is still virgin and unexploited. Here, the Tidewater Lumber Company has established a logging camp, where the logs are harvested and processed. The logs are dumped at Tide- water, and then hauled by train to the mills. The logs are banked in rows, ready for transport. The Tidewater Lumber Company has one of the largest logging operations in the state, and is known for its efficient and sustainable logging practices. The company has been practicing selective logging and habitat conservation, ensuring that the forest is protected and preserved for future generations.
