IN THE CHURCHES

BISHOP THOBURN TO PREACH AT TAYLOR STREET METHODIST

Bishop J. M. Thoburn will preach at 10:30 this morning in the Taylor-Street Methodist Episcopal Church, at the corner of Third street. Bishop Thoburn is known the world over for the great missionary work which he has so successfully directed in India during the past 40 years. The work has grown in that time from a very few until some of the large conferences of the church are found in that land, requiring the attention of two resident bishops. Bishop Thoburn was one of the first to enter the Philippine Islands after the battle of Manila Bay, and few men have a better understanding of the problems growing out of the relation of those islands to the Pacific Coast. Rev. H. J. Talbott will preach at 7:45. The class meeting is held at 9:30, the Sunday school at 12:15, and the Epworth League, which will be led by Miss Mary Talbott, at 6:30.

* * *

Rev. Ray Palmer, D. D., formerly pastor of the Second Baptist Church of this city for many years, will come to Portland soon for a two weeks' visit among his old friends, arriving August 8. Dr. Palmer will make a six weeks' lecturing tour through the Pacific States, after which he will enter upon a new field of work in Chicago, October 1, where he has recently been called.

* * *

At the First Unitarian Church, Yamhill and Seventh streets, at the service at 11, the pastor, Rev. Dr. George Croswell Cressey, will speak. This will be the last service until September, the church being closed during the remainder of July and August.

SPIRITUALISTS FORM ASSOCIATION

For the Purpose of Promulgating Spiritualism Throughout Oregon.

A meeting was held Wednesday, July 9, in the parlors of the World's Advance Thought, at 193 Sixth street, for the purpose of organizing a State Spiritualist Association of Oregon. The meeting was well attended, and a great deal of interest was manifested in the movement. The object of the organization is to promulgate the philosophy of Spiritualism, to the principle of universal brotherhood, equality of man and the welfare of humanity, to bring the existing societies together under one general association, and to form new societies. The society will be known as the State Spiritualists' Association of Oregon, and will be incorporated under the laws of Oregon. Officers were elected and committees selected for the preliminary work of organization.

The following are the officers elected, who constitute the Board of Directors: J. H. Lucas, president; Lucy A. Mallory, vice-president; Ludwig B. Larsen, secretary; Captain J. H. McMillen, treasurer; Dr. D. A. McIntire, G. C. Love, G. E. Beeson, A. Lazelle, J. S. Greenfield. The next meeting will be held July 30, and the first annual convention will be held September 3.

IN THE WORLD OF BOOKS

The world-wide interest in the Island of Martinique, since the terrible eruption of Mount Pelee, May 8, gives particular emphasis to the value of Lafcadio Hearn's valuable contribution to the world of letters, entitled, "Two Years in the French West Indies," published by Harper & Brothers, New York.

Always a writer of intense feeling and power of descriptive work, it may be set down as certain that in this book Mr. Hearn has surpassed all former efforts; perhaps, and especially so when he has taken real flesh and blood as his theme, and a people at that, possessed of more warmth and Eldoradic temperament in the abandon of their dreamy lives than any the sun ever shown upon. Hearn tells of this people at St. Pierre in a thrill of ecstatic, positively brilliant rhetoric. Perhaps no modern writer is his equal in command of exquisite and yet withal powerful English. Of St. Pierre he writes as one inspired. No man has ever, no one could surpass his telling of this astonishing and picturesque population. Their origin, their all-pervading yellow color, the never-ending and capricious display of tint, of which, the author says, "the more one observes these costumes, the more one feels that only Nature could have thought such rare comprehension of powers and harmonies among colors—such knowledge of chromatic witchcrafts and chromatic laws." In a closing paragraph to an early chapter he apostrophizes the head dress of Mount Pelee as follows:

"This evening as I write, La Pelee is more heavily coiffured than is her wont. Of purple and lilac cloud the coiffure is a magnificent. Madras, yellow banded by the sinking sun. La Pelee is in costume de fete, like a caprasse attired for a baptism or a ball, and in her phantom turban one great star glimmers for a brooch."

And so all through the telling of this story of the great West Indies, Hearn is audacious, alliterative, alluring. He has a monstrous, prodigious vocabulary, and in that land of volcanic thunders, green vistas and slopes his words flow in such rythmic measure as to suggest more vividly whatever he aims to picture. It is this vividness of Hearn which captivates and the lover of brilliant style finds in him the realization of all that scintillates and dazzles. His is a style that overwhelms in its amazing multitude of melting cadences, while his meaning is never sacrificed to mere word-coloring. He is both florid and forceful, and withal the greatest master of alliterative altitudes ever scaled by reporter's pen.

To the student of nature, Hearn is a revelation. He took this tour through these violet-hued islands and molded their outlines into a great canvass, as if by a Turner or a Church, putting his atmosphere and ocean and green fields and mountains and the poetic people into words instead of paint. But the image is not lost. It cannot fade.

Of Mount Pelee, as if himself a great prophet, he wrote as he left the little toy cemetery, Du Mouilage, one day:

"Some day there may be a great change in the little City of St. Pierre—there may be less money and less zeal, and less remembrance of the lost. Then from the morn, over the bulwark, the green host will move down unopposed, creepers will prepare the way, dislocating the pretty tombs, pulling away the checkered tiling; then will come the giants, rooting deeper, feeling for the hearts, groping among the bones, and all that love has hidden away shall be restored to Nature, absorbed into the rich juices of her verdure, revitalized in her bursts of color, resurrected in her upliftings of emerald and gold to the great sun." CHARLES THOMAS LOGAN.

"Rataplan, a Rogue Elephant."

Books that help us to a more intimate acquaintance with the habits, traits, and characteristics of animals are very welcome. The latest addition to this literature is a volume of spirited and well-told stories from the pen of Ellen Velvin, a writer of many successful books for children, a magazinist of acknowledged ability, and a Fellow of the Zoological Society. (London.) She is already known to the American public by her popular series of animal stories now running in the New York Herald, entitled "Wild Creatures Afield—Nature Studies of Forest Folk."

No better tales of animal life have been written, for the author takes us into the very heart of things, giving us the tragedies and the comedies in the daily life and experiences of dwellers in wood and and jungle, on plain and crag. They present much evidence that Miss Velvin has lived very close to nature.

"Rataplan, a Rogue Elephant, and Other Stories" is a book of uncommon merit, a delight to the eye as well as to the mind, Rataplan, himself wicked and crafty, romantic "Gean the Giraffe;" sly and tricky "Jinks the Jackal," whose natural tendencies could not be overcome by kindness; "Keesa, the Adventurous Kangaroo"; stately "Osra, the Ostrich"; "Mona, the unlucky Monkey," all the way down the list, these touch the springs of the reader's sympathies, as their traits, good and evil alike, as judged by human standards, are portrayed with force and vividness.

Miss Velvin's stories ring true, and the spirited treatment of each subject causes her to easily take rank among the best nature writers of the day. She is no imitator; her field is her own, and she puts enough of human interest into her stories to show that it is barbarous and cruel to kill, out of pure wantoness, creatures whose intimate life is so absorbingly interesting.

That children make grave blunders in caring for their pets, is strongly brought out in the story of "Siccatee, the Squirrel," and it is also shown that these blunders are the result of ignorance as to the requirements of their living toys.

The book is delightful reading from cover to cover, and typographically worthy of the heartiest appreciation of the most exacting critic. Mr. Verbeek's admirable drawings, which are full page in form and twelve in number, have been most artistically reproduced in color, and are all that can be desired in the way of illustration.—Henry Altemus Company, Philadelphia.

Describing Disease in Novels.

Apropos of the recent publication of a life of William Black, the novelist, the British Medical Journal gives some interesting comment on the writer's habit of consulting medical specialists regarding the diseases of his characters.

"He had a horror of carelessness and scamped work; . . . he never subjected one of his characters to any abnormal conditions without satisfying himself that his description of those conditions was scientifically accurate. Accordingly we do not find in Black's novels such absurdities as the use of the stomach-pump in the treatment of poisoning by the hypodermic injection of morphine, as described the other day by the author of a story appearing in a recent magazine; or 'pyemia' classed with the pleura, the thorax and the clavicle as parts of the human anatomy, as is done in Mr. George W. Cable's novel, 'The Cavalier.' It is not every novelist, of course, who can in any difficulty appeal to one of the shining lights of medical science. But all can use reasonable care not to go wildly wrong. Gustave Flaubert, who had himself studied medicine, took extraordinary pains to get medical details accurate, and M. Zola, as might be expected, laboriously gets up his facts. Thus, when he wishes to describe the death of Nana, from smallpox, we find him writing to a friend for reference to detailed descriptions of the disease. But although his industry in collecting 'documents' is beyond praise, in medical matters he is too apt to rely on the light of nature for their interpretation. Hence, as in 'Lourdes,' his craving for 'realistic' effect, unrestrained by practical knowledge of skilled advice, makes him draw pictures of disease which have no counterpart in clinical or pathological fact. In connection with this subject it may be mentioned that not long ago an American novelist thought himself exceedingly ill-used because his family doctor, of whom he had sought counsel as to the right manner of disposing of one of the creatures of his fancy, afterward sent him a bill for professional services. Would the novelist admit any right on the part of the doctor to ask him to write a short story for nothing?"

"The Suitors of Yvonne."

"The Suitors of Yvonne," by Rafael Sabatini, can never be criticised on the ground of lack of action. Every chapter of it contains enough dash and spirit to float an ordinary tale. In its "stage settings" and general character it somewhat resembles the stories of Stanley Weyman, but in originality of plot and vigorous style it is unique.

Mr. Rafael Sabatini was born at Jesi, Central Italy, in 1875. His childhood was spent in Portugal, and he was educated in the most cosmopolitan of educational centers, German-speaking Switzerland. Nine years ago he settled in England, his mother's native country, where he appears to be permanently established. Speaking and writing six modern languages with equal facility, and having friends and relatives in four different countries, Mr. Sabatini may well claim to be a European rather than a citizen of any distinct nationality.

It is now four years since Mr. Sabatini began to write fiction, making his first bow to the public with short stories that immediately attracted attention. His success in this line prompted him to more ambitious efforts, and his first novel, "The Suitors of Yvonne," which was recently published by the Putnams, more than fulfills the promise of his earlier work.

Kipling's "Just So" Stories.

It has been a long time since Kipling has published anything which may be called a volume. "Kim" might be a book after writing which the author could die and feel sure of future fame, but the vast majority of readers who ever were interested in Kipling hope that "Kim" may not be the last. Of course, it will not be. A volume of "Just-So Stories" will be ready shortly, and as a distinguishing feature many of the illustrations will have been done by the author. Besides this, there is now published in England a paper which Kipling has written and called a "guide" to the naval review. Kipling's long experience on the warships of the English navy makes him competent to write of the steel fighters which will make their peaceful parade on review during the Summer. In one of the July magazines there appears a story by Kipling, entitled "Wireless," in which Marconi's progress in wireless telegraphy is one of the themes.

This new work of Kipling—his book and short stories—brings to mind the fact that not long ago a versemaker whose name and fame will not weigh him down with riches nor yet cause him to be remembered long, wrote an attack on Kipling which purported to be an account of his "passing." There are two things equally disagreeable—the belittling of a great man and the hysteria over him. Kipling has suffered from both, and yet his greatness has not been affected nor the quality of his work injured by either.

Life of Bret Harte.

An authorized life of Bret Harte is now being prepared by T. E. Pemberton, dramatic critic of the Birmingham (Eng.) Post and biographer of numerous actors—Sothern, John Hare, Robertson, the Kendalls, etc. It seems that Mr. Pemberton was closely associated with Mr. Harte as collaborator in several dramatic pieces, so that his selection as biographer of Harte may have been the author's personal choice. It will be a matter of regret that an American who has come in contact with the life of the West as Harte knew it was not chosen for the biographical work. Notwithstanding the fact that Harte had become thoroughly identified with English manners and customs, it was the early California life which gave him material for the stories which made the greatest success for him. Some one has suggested that Mark Twain would have been just the man for the place. He certainly knew the life of early California mining camps—he knew Harte in those days, he continued for years an intimate acquaintanceship, and for a considerable time he was a fellow-American transplanted to English soil.

Do People of Today Care for Poetry?

An eminent French critic recently advanced the contention that poetry has had its day. The need for poetry, he maintained, like the need for mythical religions, no longer exists in the world of Western civilization; therefore there will be no more great poets and great poetry, only poetasters and metric drivel. We cannot agree with the eminent critic. His temperament, we must believe, is fundamentally unpoetic; he is not "moved by a concord of sweet sounds"; his emotion is not intense enough to beat into rythm and to require rythm for its utterance. He is probably deluded into the belief, also, that because his country has produced no new poetic light of any magnitude for a number of years, it will never again see a Hugo or a de Musset. But if he would look back over the ages, he would see what long stretches of time have often separated great poets from their successors, not only in his own, but in every country. Indeed, all the centuries have given the world but a few really great poets, poets of the breed of Homer and Shakespeare and Goethe and Tennyson. It would not be surprising, therefore, if our generation failed to bring one forth; but other generations surely will, and the great ones that are to be will find new themes and see and feel the old ones in new ways, and surely will they need the imagery and music and license of poetic forms adequately to communicate to others the splendor and intensity of their inspirations. Prose cannot perform the functions of the highest poetry—not even such wonderful prose as the best French—any more than a horse-of-all-work can fulfill the duties of a thoroughbred racer. English prose, with its inherent reserve and its imposed limitations on intensity and on the fanciful play of color and images, could less easily than French dispense with poetry, and do the whole work of literature by itself.—Harper's Weekly.
