King Edward Suits the French

Boston Transcript. The entente cordiale has truly softened the French. Here is how the Revue de Paris approves of England's King: "In Edward VII we trace the features which, so to speak, are common to the race. No one possesses in a higher degree the personal qualities of a gentleman. In morale, sonal qualities of a gentleman. In morale, as in physique, he is truly the 'roi-gentle-man.' He has that cordinity, that good sense, mingled with humor, and that ease of speech which one finds in a certain de-gree among well-educated Englishmen. When we say facility of speech, let us not confound it with the art of conversation, which is peculiarly ours. The English eloquence does not resemble ours; it is often devoid of thetoric; it has neither sonority nor color. But it is a language often devoid of rhetoric; it has neither sonority nor color. But it is a language in which, in scorn of composition, every Erig-lish gentleman knows how to express his opinions. . The King knows that in a parliamentary monarchy he cannot be at the same time General. Admiral, finan-cler, economist and diplomatist. On the world's stage, which he does not pretend to occupy himself alone, he does not essay the role of those Fregoli monarchs who every day. In a new costume produces every day, in a new costume, produce a new idea in order to dazzle the multitude. To direct and control the foreign policy of his country appears to him to be a suf-

of his country appears to him to be a suf-ficient occupation. "We do not ask of King Edward the profound calculations and the far-reach-ing policy of a Bismarck. However clev-er and far-seeing it may be the policy of the King preserves its English character. One would say it is excellent opportunism. The foreign policy may be compared to 'the operations of a great banking firm. The King avoids hazardous speculations and is content to find good investments as a father of a family. His intimacy with great financiers has given him that with great financiers has given him that with great financiers has given him that wide survey and practical common sense necessary for such a role. He has, in-deed, what is commonly called the fore-sight of a financier. . . In the conflict of peoples and races which we are wit-nessing in the Far East, and which en-gages the mind of the civilized world, all eyes turn toward Edward VII as toward one of the most factors in that one of the most important factors in that great problem. The world seeks to guess his thoughts and to penetrate his intentions, and that shows us better than any thing the importance attached to the King's personality. Without ostentation, and after reigning for three years only, his imposing figure has by degrees im-pressed itself on the attention of all. We pressed itself on the attention of all. We see that, almost unknown to his own country, he has attained a commanding position in Europe. Today he is recognized not only as the ablest diplomatist of his country, but as a great constitutional sov-ereign, respected by his people and its-tened to by his Ministers. Side by side with the German Emperor, and at his ex-nerse he has communed a great place is pense, he has conquered a great place in the world's pollitics. We look in vain to-day for the disproportion and the contrast which struck so forcibly all the spectators of the funeral of Queen Victoria, when of the funoral of Queen Victoria, when William II appeared to take his uncle un-der his wing. If the comparison were made today, it would not be to the disad-vantage of Edward VII. "Edward VII neither writes nor speaks too much. He does not yield to the temp-tation of uttering oracles. He preaches no sermona, delivers no lectures on history, and does not indulge⁶ in theological defini-tions. He das never spoken either of Ham-
