Referring to the acquiescence of President Roosevelt in the desire of Emperor William to call the second peace conference at The Hague, Mr. Barthold said:

"It was most graceful of the President thus to defer to Emperor Nicholas, who has been so long and so graciously preciated. I don't know when the conference will be held, but very likely it may be next Spring. That it will accomplish a great and lasting good, I have no doubt."

"The German Emperor," continued Mr. Barthold, "is the most intense American in Europe. He is genial and democratic; his frank and action speak cordially as a King of Belgium is charming in demeanor and frank in conversation, but does not shake hands with politicians. American can be admired in Belgium, and it is to be noted that English-English of the United States is spoken very generally in the country."

Mr. Barthold assured the President that the sentiment in favor of the adjustment of international differences by arbitration was increasing materially in Europe. The Brussels conference was a most important step in international arbitration, the participants being many of the most prominent members of the legislative bodies of the world.
