NEW STORIES OF OLD INDIA

A NATIVE RULER WITH MORE WIVES THAN SOLOMON HAD

CALCUTTA. Jan. 22.-A Curranta, 100 miles south of Calcutta, near the sea, a man was arrested in a native dress. The man, identified as an Indian, was found to be carrying a large number of documents containing evidence of fraud. The man, who was known as a "hijrah," or itinerant trader, was charged with stealing valuable goods from the local market. He was later found to be a member of a criminal gang that had been operating in the area for several years.

AN INDIAN RULER

In the background, a photograph of the ruler of a small Indian kingdom is shown. The ruler is depicted wearing traditional Indian clothing and standing on a throne. The photograph is accompanied by a caption that reads: "This is the ruler of the small kingdom in the Indian subcontinent. He is known for his wisdom and leadership."}

SNAKE CHARMERS OF INDIA

In the foreground, a group of snake charmers is shown. The charmers are depicted performing their craft, with snakes coiled around their bodies. The photograph is accompanied by a caption that reads: "Snake charmers are a common sight in India, where they are often seen performing their craft in public squares and streets."