TRAGEDY CAUSED BY FAIR RUSSIAN

Her Fraillies and Intrigues
Climax in Plot to Murder
Her Lover.

LAWYER HER CONFEDERATE

To Get Insurance on Karamovsky's Life, Countess Tarnovsky Schemes With Prilukoff to Provoke Boy to Murderous Frenzy.

LONDON, Sept. 14.—Countess Maria Riniolaevna Tarnovsky, a beautiful Russian, is at present the central figure of a story of intrigue and murder which has stirred half the capitals of Europe.

As a result of her wiles, it is alleged, a wealthy Russian nobleman, Count Karamovsky, who expected to marry the Countess, was slain this week at Venice. The assassin is a youth named Naumoff, son of an ex-Governor of Orel. He was madly enamored of the woman, and it was through his jealousy of her that he was driven to commit the crime. Naumoff's fatal jealousy was aroused by the third lover, a Moscow lawyer named Prilukoff.

The confessions of the Countess and Mr. Prilukoff indicate that the motive of their plot was to obtain the $100,000 for which the infatuated Karamovsky had insured his life in the Countess' favor. Application was made by Karamovsky for such a policy to a London company last month. The agents of the company found the Count and Countess living together as man and wife at one of the leading hotels of Vienna. It was learned that the Count possessed vast estates in Russia and expected to marry the Countess, but for some reason the insurance company declined such a risk. A few days later the policy was issued by an Austrian company.

Caused Husband to Kill Man.

Meantime M. Prilukoff was following the Countess everywhere. She formerly was the wife of a Russian army officer, and although apparently an ideal mother of three children, her conduct with other officers at Kiev gave rise to scandal. One evening at a reception in her own house she put her arms about an officer's neck. Her husband immediately shot the man dead. He was acquitted by a jury, and then obtained a divorce. Countess Tarnovsky's lawyer on this occasion was M. Prilukoff, who became infatuated with her. Shortly afterward he embezzled a large sum of money, and he and the Countess fled together, first to Paris, then to Vienna and Berlin. While they were residing last May in Berlin the Countess deserted M. Prilukoff and went to Russia, where she met Count Karamovsky, whom she had known before her divorce. M. Prilukoff, unable to follow her across the frontier, went to Paris, whence he sent her a number of imploring telegrams. When the Countess returned to Germany, accompanied by Karamovsky, she and Prilukoff had a reconciliation and met frequently in secret. The Countess in the meantime had obtained the insurance policy.

Plotted Murder of Lover.

From the allegations and counter charges subsequently made in the case it appears that the Countess and Prilukoff frequently discussed the possibility of getting rid of Karamovsky for the sake of the insurance money. One plan was for Prilukoff to offer Karamovsky a cigarette containing opium, and when the victim was dazed finish him with a knife or revolver. Prilukoff hesitated to execute this plan for fear that the Countess later would regret the murder and turn against him.

He was not long in forming what he considered a better plan, and the Countess, followed ever by Prilukoff, went to Venice, where Karamovsky owned a handsome villa. There, at a secret meeting, the Countess confessed to Prilukoff that there was a young Russian noble, Nikolai Naumoff, who madly loved her and whom she was beginning to love.

Infatuated Boy a Catspaw.

The Countess says Prilukoff immediately suggested that they use the youth to carry out the dangerous part of the plan. Prilukoff found out that Naumoff was in Vienna, and he arranged for scenes there designed to arouse the young lover's jealousy. He also persuaded the Countess to tell Naumoff that Karamovsky was mistreating her and that she was a martyr to his cruelty. Finally Prilukoff sent her a false telegram from Vienna signed "Karamovsky," which she was to show to Naumoff. The telegram ran: "I know all. Your Naumoff is a loafer and a mere boy. You are worthless. I am sorry for the feelings I had for you."

On reading the telegram, Naumoff's wrath reached the culminating point, and he immediately started for Venice to kill Karamovsky. The Countess wired Prilukoff that Naumoff was coming. Prilukoff, who was not known to Naumoff, awaited him with detectives at the station, and followed him until he entered the Count's villa to prevent his escape, and thus, with one stroke, remove two rivals. After the murder and Naumoff's arrest, Prilukoff joined the Countess in Vienna, where later they were arrested. They are now awaiting extradition.

Countess' Lavish Expenses.

The Countess is an inveterate cigarette smoker, and while under detention almost continuously smokes Russian cigarettes which have a peculiar aroma. She orders costly meals sent in from leading hotels and restaurants of Vienna. When the Countess was arrested she was found in possession of $500 and her fingers were covered with rings.

Immigrants From British Isles.

LONDON, Sept. 11.—More than 17,000 British and Irish immigrants went to the United States and Canada during the last year, according to a board of trade report issued today. The total was greater than that of any year since 1887. Canada received last year the largest number of emigrants, 91,000, nearly 30,000 more than the previous highest total for the Dominion.
