LEADER'S HEALTH OF GRAVE CONCERN

Joseph Chamberlain May Not Return to His Place in Public Life.

MANTLE FOR SON AUSTEN

Party Calling for Him, but He Rarely Appears Outside His Private Grounds—Son Thought Too Weak to Displace Balfour.

LONDON, Oct. 19.—(Special).—Reports from Birmingham state that Joseph Chamberlain's health is again forming the subject of considerable speculation there in relation to the possibility of his being again seen in public life. The members of the family continue to assert that the improvement in his health warrants the expectation that he may return to the House of Commons. This, of course, is quite natural on their part, but in Birmingham no such expectation is entertained. The fact that Mr. Chamberlain is never seen outside his own grounds except when driving in the country very occasionally shows that he cannot have regained sufficient physical vigor to render it likely that he can face the exertion of reappearing in the House of Commons next session. As a matter of fact, his condition has been practically stationary during the past two months. As at present arranged, he will leave Birmingham, when the severe weather sets in, for Valescure to stay until the late Spring.

Chamberlain is Needed.
Jesse Collins, M. P., speaking in Bordeaux the other night, said he thought it very likely there would be a general election next year. The government would come back with a less majority, which would be to their advantage. Since the retirement of Mr. Chamberlain things had not been going on well. He hoped and believed, however, Mr. Chamberlain would come back again to give them the benefit of his counsel and advice, for they needed it. To his mind the Unionist Party was like men going through the wilderness without a Moses. The young members were chafing under the faction to which they were condemned. They had a leadership that created no enthusiasm, but rather damaged it. They had a leadership halting between two opinions, recognizing in an academic and half-hearted way the great item in Mr. Chamberlain's platform of tariff reform, but the efforts they were putting forth to further that policy, compared with what those efforts ought to be, were poor and puny. The younger members were dissatisfied, and did not hesitate to express their dissatisfaction. What he felt was felt probably by the majority of the House of Commons.

Mantle for Chamberlain's Son.
It is believed that Mr. Collins' speech is intended to prepare the way for an attempt to supplant Mr. Balfour in the leadership by Austen Chamberlain. Mr. Collins in effect admitted that Joseph Chamberlain can never take part again in public meetings, and it is said that the one object he now lives for is to hand over his mantle to his favorite son. Mr. Collins and his friends now realize that they are losing ground every day, that they allow themselves to be forced by Mr. Balfour, and a determined effort is at last to be made to oust him from the leadership. The only chance of continuing the Chamberlain succession is by making the fight while Mr. Chamberlain is himself there to direct it, for—once he is out of the way Austen Chamberlain would stand to his proper level. There is no doubt that tariff reform has a firm hold on all the fighting elements in the party, and that if Austen Chamberlain were capable of displaying any force or initiative he could secure the deposition of Mr. Balfour.

FRENCH WANT AN ANNAPOLIS

Recognize Need of Training Naval Officers in Mechanics.
PARIS, Oct. 19.—(Special).—A schema of great importance, having relation to the future training of French naval officers, has been prepared at the Ministry of Marine, and is to be discussed this month by the Superior Council of the Navy, and in the following month to be submitted to the Chambers. A few weeks since the Minister of Marine addressed a memorandum to the naval staff at Brest, drawing his attention to the increasing necessity of familiarizing naval cadets with the use of mechanical appliances and the construction and other machinery. He said that the necessity of competence in this matter was daily growing greater, owing to the multiplicity of mechanical appliances on board ships of war. The object of this memorandum was to institute an inquiry into the possibility of creating at Brest a school analogous to the United States Naval College at Annapolis, or the establishment which has been brought into existence for the training of British naval officers. Accordingly Captain Perrin was instructed to report upon the subject, and to indicate how the necessary appliances and machinery could be installed, and the staff that would be required. The proposals have since been further discussed, and have now taken such shape that they can be submitted for final decision.

French Socialists Split.
PARIS, Oct. 19.—(Special).—Recent events in France have produced a divergence between the two most advanced sections of French politics—the Federation of Radicals and Radical Socialists and the Socialists, pure and simple, combined under the title of United Socialists. A few days ago a meeting of the Federation was held in Paris, at which a resolution was agreed to unanimously, to the effect that while the Federation, in the future, as in the past, is willing to work with the United Socialists for the realization of democratic reforms, they can no longer support Socialist candidates who are in favor of a general strike, or of insurrection in case of war.
