

"For me, let me dwell in my nook. Here, by the curve of this brook, That croons to the tune of my book, Whose melody wafts me forever On the waves of an unseen river!"

-William Freeland.

SAVING THE FLYING DEATH

In Corea, With Marquis Ito, by George Trumbull Ladd. D. H. Ruggles, 1230. "Charles Scribner's Sons, New York City. Early in August, 1904, Dr. Ladd left New Haven, Conn., for a three-month visit to Japan, as he had been engaged to deliver a series of lectures in educational institutions in that country, and coming on his visit during the time in which Japan had tried conclusions with Russia and had thereby been enabled to spring into prominence as a new world power. The lecturer, however, ordinary significance. The fine Japanese, not Italian, hand of diplomacy was working. Not very long after Dr. Ladd arrived a hint was dropped that the Marquis Ito, the real ruler of Corea, would extend an invitation to visit him in his Corea residence.

read about an American officer whom Washington cordially hated, and once called "a outrageous pig." Burr's eventual "life is pictured to the close, and this is his death-bed scene: "You have seen the kindly doctor, are you to leave us with a heart full of envy?" "I shall die as I have lived—having been hated, loved, and hated, and I shall die as I have lived, as I have lived, as I have lived, as I have lived."

Did Dr. Ladd accept? Rather. So he had written a pleasantly discursive book of 482 pages showing that the real savior of Corea is Japan. The impression lingers that he had been deliberately selected in advance by the astute Japanese as a man of tact to whom could be committed the task of enlightening the American mind about Japan's "civilizing" policy for Mexico to sell and the United States to buy the peninsula of Lower California?

The "half-tone on this week's book page shows the features of Samuel Hopkins Adams, who wrote that sensational novel of English life, "The Flying Death." As a high official was passing through the streets heavily guarded, a number of men followed him, and he was heard to remark that if he were to be killed, it would not be a great loss. He had heard that after his term of penal labor was over the first thing he would do would be to go to the United States and make like him. These words were heard by all, and they continued until the Minister was out of sight.

"The Mother's Child's First Bible Teacher," by Mary J. Chisholm Foster, 25 cents. This is a book for mothers to use with their children. It contains 25 lessons, each with a story and a lesson. The stories are taken from the Bible, and the lessons are practical and easy to understand.

Mr. Hinchman is master of English at Groton School, Mass., and Mr. Gummere is professor of English in Harvard College. This admirable book gives in condensed, comprehensive form the lives of most of the great English authors whom a student would naturally wish to know about, without being put to the trouble of scanning many volumes in order to get the information wanted. How the author is a student of the lives of these writers is shown in the text of the book.

The "Sixth Step," by E. J. Rath, Moffat, York Co., New York City. Imagine a motor-bomb, called the "Projector," being used to destroy the waters at the rate of over 100 miles an hour, and think of the execution she could accomplish in case of war. There is a sentence in the germ of this novel. The theme is worked out to a highly interesting denouement. J. M. QUENTIN.

Two new books for boys are promised within a week. One will touch upon the romantic possibilities of imaginary adventures in the tropics, and the other is "The Problem of the Pacific." The other is "Harper's Indoor Book for Boys" telling a boy how to turn work into play.

"Between the Lines," famous as a war story, has been published by the Boston edition of a new printing. "The Green Heron" by R. M. H. is a new book. The "Chestnut Tree" by R. M. H. is a new book. The "Chestnut Tree" by R. M. H. is a new book. The "Chestnut Tree" by R. M. H. is a new book.

As an American Patriot: Or the Story of Aaron Burr, by Alfred Henry Lewis, illustrated by J. A. Spill and J. S. G. Company, Portland. Aaron Burr, the American statesman and sometimes the enemy and then the friend of George Washington and Alexander Hamilton, is pictured in this novel as a brave soldier and the most perfect hero in history as the man who in a duel, killed Alexander Hamilton, at Weehawken, N. J., July 7, 1804, and afterward planned to collect a body of freebooters and attempt to conquer Texas and possibly Mexico, and establish a republic of which he should preside as Aaron I. of Mexico.

"Mind in the Making," by Maria J. Swift, Professor of Pedagogy in Washington University, St. Louis, Mo. describes the various phases of a child's growth, both physically and mentally. It is a clear, direct and interesting study of the child's mind, and it is a book that every parent and teacher should have.

"The Duke of Gauda," Swinburn's new poem of the Duke of Gauda, is a fine, direct and interesting study of the child's mind, and it is a book that every parent and teacher should have.

A NEW ENGLAND CITY MADE OVER

Springfield, Massachusetts, to Be New Civic Center of Four Acres With Three-Mile River Front Boulevard.

DURING the next few months the State Railroad Commission and the different city authorities having to do with various phases of the subject will be actively engaged upon the great plan for the transformation of Springfield, at a cost of many millions of dollars, which has an important bearing on railway conditions in New England and New York.

Under the provisions of the enabling act passed at the last session of the Legislature the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad has obtained a right-of-way across the City of Springfield, the work being done by the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad. The plan has opened the way to a comprehensive scheme of public improvement for Springfield, which exceeds in scope anything projected for any other place of similar size in the country.

Along the Connecticut, which involves the removal of two miles of railway tracks to the west side of the river and the removal of numerous large mounds of earth from their present sites on the river bank, the building of a new bridge across the Connecticut, near the center of the riverfront park, the reconstruction of the junction passenger station and extensive changes in surrounding property, the extension of streets running parallel with Main street, on the east and west sides of that thoroughfare, so as to make three business streets adapted to through traffic, instead of one; the extension of Court square to the river bank, making it a civic center around which will be grouped various municipal and county buildings and other structures of a pretentious character; the erection of a new public library costing $200,000 on State street, near the river; the widening of State street, and the widening of Court square, the widening of Memorial Hall, occupied by the Grand Army of the Republic and allied organizations.

The historic First Church edifice, almost a century old, probably will have a place in the same group. It is the only building which has not been removed from the enlarged square. It is likely that this will be moved to one side of the square, so as to leave an open space between Main street and the river. The view from the proposed riverfront park will be one of great natural beauty, overlooking the willow-fringed west bank and its background of green meadows and elm trees, on either side of the stream, which empties into the Connecticut at this point.

The whole plan of railway changes in Springfield is now before the State Railroad Commission, to which it was referred by the legislature of last year. This board has full power to decide all changes, subject to a veto power of the City Council. The changes include, besides those already indicated, the abolition of a series of grade-crossings on the New Haven's Highland division.

The Park Commissioners are authorized to acquire these plants to other uses, or in such manner as it sees fit, taking into account the interest of river navigation in the future. The act also provides for temporary waterworks facilities for the electric light and gas companies, whose plants are located on the river bank, and for the ultimate acquisition of these plants to other uses. President Mellen has offered to sell the land now occupied by the tracks to the city for park purposes for $200,000. Toward the sum required about $200,000 has been subscribed by individual citizens.

STEAM AND SPEED AGAINST SAIL

Transatlantic Travel in the Last Fifty-six Years—Some Fast Ocean Records.

"GOOD-BYE, Romance," the skipper said. "He vanished with the coal we burn; Our dial marks full speed ahead. Our speed is timed to half a turn. So are the tidal turns we fly, 'Twixt port and port, Romance, good-bye." Romance has indeed gone from transatlantic travel. That is, all except the Cupid variety, which buds and blossoms in sequestered dock corners and cozy, hidden nooks of ocean steamships and leads to matrimony or alimony. But the romance of the sailing vessel, clipper ships and the packets, as far as the passenger service to European ports is concerned, disappeared with the arrival of the Atlantic in ten days and two hours the death-knell of the sailing vessel as a passenger craft was sounded, and the old-time clipper with her skylark, star-creepers and heaven-disturbers bellying to the breeze, has long since disappeared from the sea. With them has gone the last element of the romantic romance, the person of the sea who knew every rock and spar and could beat the compass forward and backward, whereas they can only repeat the prearranged plan.

Three ships and now numbers five. The Atlantic Transport line's four vessels were placed in commission since 1897. The vessels were then operated by the Cunard line, which has since acquired the famous Lusitania. In the last ten years eight steamships flying the Cunard flag have been launched, including the record-breaking "turners," the Lusitania and the Mauretania.

From a French Viewpoint

New York Times. M. Luzzanne rose, with a delightful smile, from the desk where he had been writing. He radiated geniality and courtesy as he came forward, and when he bowed he brought his heels together in a way that seemed to him a fair idea of the spoken 20 words before he had established an atmosphere of ease, warmth and interest. He possesses the "blue rose" of magnetism, and as he talks the most commonplace subjects grow absorbing. "It is like to walk through the streets," he said, "and to touch with the people I cannot seem to feel them, or the soul of them, when I drive or go in motors or streetcars. I want the living touch of the human element, and that is worth 20 times more to me than the finest achievements of art or literature or music. It is the quality of life, the feeling, the touch, here with me, living, breathing, experiencing, achieving, falling. When I have traveled, my friends have said to me, 'See! Here is Baudouin. Be sure you go to see a gallery, or this museum. And do not fail to see the fresco in the palace of So-and-so.' But I—I put the fresco in the museum, and the museum in the street of the city. There I find people, there I find the living touch. I cannot get the picture, the architecture, the rare books—is it not?"

But more than anything else which I have so far remarked in any York you, your speed has struck me as extraordinary. In everything you are miraculously quick. Everything moves much faster than it is in the real world. People, elevators, trains, legal proceedings, boats, journalism—he laughed—"all things seem to be running a race in the city. It is an average speed of over 12 knots an hour."
