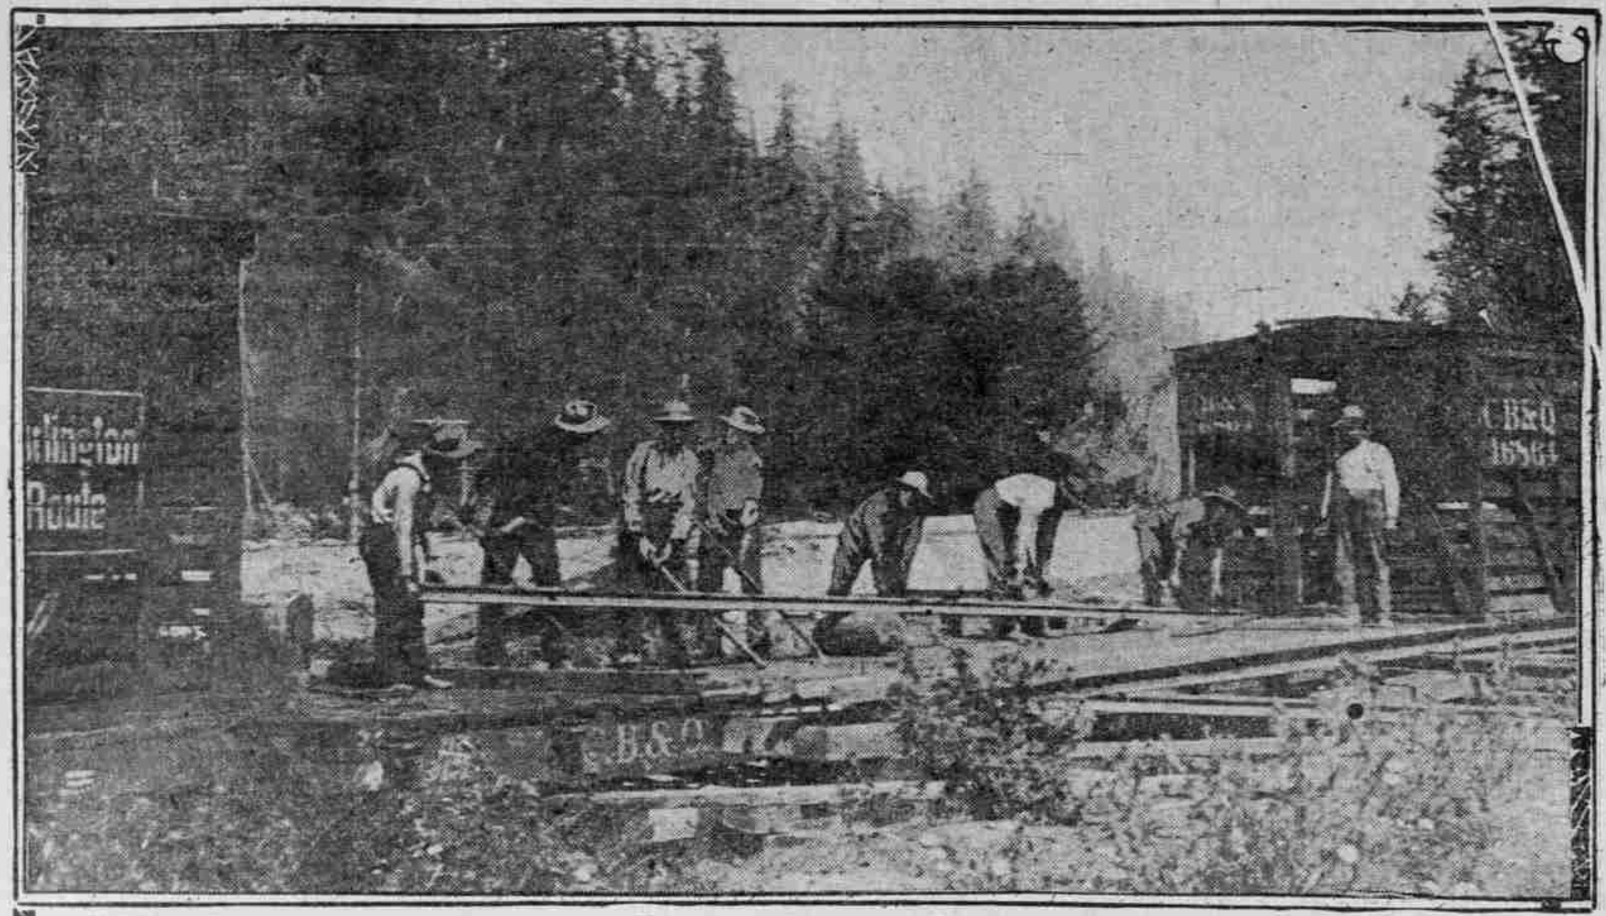
United Railways Begins Building Line From Portland to Tillamook

ROAD WILL FIRST BE BUILT TO LINNTON, AND FROM THERE TO WASHINGTON COUNTY



UNLOADING STEEL RAILS FOR THE UNITED RAILWAYS LINE NEAR LINNTON

GRADING FOR THE UNITED RAILWAYS LINE ON THE LINNTON ROAD.

ACTUAL construction of another interurban trolley system out of Portland was begun during the past week, when the United Railways started work on the line to Linnton, which is the first link in a line to Hillsboro and Forest Grove, and thence to Tillamook and other portions of the state. Workmen are now grading on the Linnton road and the trolley road to that point, which will be in operation within the next ninety days, promises to make a thriving Portland suburb of Linnton.

Construction on the Linnton line is very easy, for the track will be laid along the Linnton road, already a level grade, and very little grading will be necessary. The promise of the company to have cars running within the next three months, it is believed, will be carried out without difficulty.

From Linnton it is expected the United Railways will build a line up into Washington County by way of Cornelius Gap, the pass through the hills west of the city. From Hillsboro, electric lines to Tillamook and nearby coast country will be laid, water power to drive the cars being secured from swift streams in the Coast Mountains.

The opening of the street railway line to Linnton will open up another nearby residence district to people of the city, and it is expected that there will be quite a boom in property down that way upon the completion of the line now being built. To show that the announcement just made is in earnest, the United Railways management has put on a big crew of workmen and teams, and rails and ties are being distributed along the route, while grading is being done wherever necessary.

CROPS HARVESTED BY ELECTRICITY

Germany's Threshers Are Motor-Driven, and Swiss Cows Bedded by White-Coal Light.

ELECTRICITY in the household is creating a sort of domestic revolution in England and other European countries just now. In the newest hotels in London, old-fashioned cookign ranges have been completely done away with. Even in King Edward's household—a conservative institution—electricity has been introduced into the kitchen, while his new yacht and the royal train have been equipped with electric cooking and heating arrangements. In several of the big laundries electricity does all the work that human hands can't do, and its other domestic uses now range from peeling potatoes to heating curling irons for my lady's hair. The main reason why electricity has not been more generally used heretofore has been the expense of current, but most of the electrical supply companies recently have reduced their prices so considerably that electric energy is placed within reach of everyone. Nearly all the companies now supply electricity "for heating purposes only" at about one-half of what they usually charge for lighting.

Domestic electricity evidently has come to stay, but it has not arrived without opposition even on the part of those whose toil it was principally intended to lessen. For instance, in Eastman's great laundry works in London recently the attempt to introduce electric ironing met with strenuous resistance on the part of nearly all the laundresses. They were prejudiced against the "newfangled irons, with bits of string tied to 'em," and almost went on strike when the manager tried to make them give up the old methods. However, being an astute judge of human nature, he quietly fitted up a room with nothing but electric irons in it. Several of the more courageous and enterprising women were sent in to work on what is called "piece work" plan, being paid so much per piece, provided they worked solely with electric irons. The main advantage of these irons is that they remain hot all the time, and as there is no changing from tepid irons to hot ones, the women were able to do twice as much ironing as was done in a given time by old methods. Consequently, being paid by the piece, they made twice as much money. When the women had had a week at piece work with the "electrics," the manager put them back at the ordinary irons, and they almost went on strike once more—this time clamoring to be allowed to work by the new method. And the electric iron—and the manager—won a triumph. Electric irons get hot almost instantly, and all the housewife has to do when she wants to iron is to turn a switch. As to expense, it has been found, with the reduction now made by the electrical companies when supplying current for "heating only," that these irons work out at about half, and in some cases one-third the cost of ordinary irons.

In a number of big hotels electricity is used for washing dishes, cutting cabbages, peeling potatoes, sharpening knives and other purposes. Small motors are attached to the machines which do these things, and the work is accomplished far more rapidly than by the ordinary process.

Of course, for several years electricity has been used in England in many big manufacturing plants for driving various kinds of machinery, such as lathes and lifting cranes, but it has only been within the last year that its general application to domestic work of all kinds has made such headway. In a large number of dairies the churns are now driven by electricity, and several bakeries are using electricity, especially for beating eggs and mixing the material for cakes, where a high speed is required.

In Germany, particularly in the district of Westphalia, several agricultural operations are carried on wholly by electric methods. In Baden the threshing and straw-baling machines are electrically driven, and many of the dairy farms are equipped with electric power. In Switzerland, nearly everything is done by electricity nowadays. All the big hotels at the tops of the mountains have electric kitchens, and most of the work is done by electricity, even to sweeping the carpets. Owing to the high altitudes of most of these places in Switzerland, it would be almost impossible to use any other power, the expense of getting coal being too great; but, with the number of waterfalls which are scattered throughout the country, any amount of cheap electric power may be had. Turbines are placed at most of the falls on the same principle as those installed at Niagara; and wires take the electric power up the mountains. Electricity is in use in all the Swiss laundries and hotels, and it is the one country in the world where housework has ceased to be a drudgery.

On several of the Swiss and German farms where electric power is not installed direct, they make their own power by bringing the water up to high pressure tanks, supplied by an automatically controlled, electric-driven pump; the water being pumped up to the roof of the tallest building. The water is then made to drive dynamos; and by this means such a large amount of power is obtained that even the cow stalls are lighted by electricity; while the power is used for chopping turnips, driving churns, making butter and threshing during the harvest. One of the great advantages of electric farming is that no naked lights are used about the barns, and the absence of the usual disastrous fires during harvest time is a marked feature in these districts.—Kansas City Star.

The fact that Alfred Soderman, of Worcester, Mass., has succeeded in growing potatoes and tomatoes on the same vine may be looked upon as an argument in favor of his pronunciation theory by the man who recently wrote: "If it is correct to pronounce the 'a' in tomato as it is in 'large,' why should not the 'a' in potato be pronounced as it is in 'barge'?"
