Miss Muriel White will be married soon to a German army officer, and the event will bring to the French capital, where her father is the United States Ambas-sador, a party of German army officers, who undoubtedly will attend the wedding full uniform. The appearance of a German army uniform on the streets of Paris may lead to complications, and the lice are already considering measures to prevent a demonstration.

Just what was the difficulty nobody knows, but it is supposed that both men had imbibed a bit too much. In consequence, so it is charged, Coffroth either cut Geggus or bit him on the check. Geggus was hurried to the baths. For a short time it was thought he was suffering from blood poisoning, and several of his friends tried to locate Coffroth. Later Geggus turned up in good shape, and now the incident is looked upon as closed. Coffroth has had a number of sessions of this nature the last few months.

Even with attorneys engaged to break the Baldwin will, the probability that no contest will take place; not at least between the widow and daugh ters. Illegitimate children may come to the front to plunge the estate into litigation, but the heirs to whom the bulk of the estate was bequeathed are not disposed to engage in a contest with the widow, partially because it would tangle up the property for sev-eral years and also because they be-lieve the widow is entitled to consideration.

The will as far as the widow is concerned, is regarded by men who were well acquainted with the deceased as a sardonic jest. For, say they, he must have known that Mrs. Baldwin would not accept a small legacy, and it must have been his desire to figure in postmortem litigation. Baldwin had a very keen appetite for the law. He hated to pay a bill without a fight in court. He resisted claims that he knew to be just, and when asked once why he be just, and when asked once why he did so, replied that he couldn't be sure he owed money until the court rendered judgment. Once upon a time he borrowed money from his lawyer to pay a judgment, and then the lawyer had to sue him to recover the borrowed coin.

The Democrats bid fair to have an amusing if not a red-hot campaign among themselves this year. Harry Flannery, a saloonman, by the way, who defeated Frank J. Sullivan for the nomination of Presidential Elector, and subsequently led Jimmy Phelan in the vote for that ticket in San Francisco, vote for that ticket in San Francisco, is out to get Gavin McNab's scalp as Bourbon boss in this neck of the woods. Flannery is reported to have planned a campaign that will involve the expenditure of at least $20,000 of his own good coin. That will mean a complete organization by districts.

Flannery is acting in concert with P. H. McCarthy, the latter desiring the labor nomination for Mayor again.

labor nomination for Mayor again. Incidentally, he would not object to the indorsement of the Flannery wing of Democracy. The new aspirant for bossship is quite active in holding conferences daily with leading local statesmen. He is reported to nave had a conference with Superior Lugge Cabaconference with Superior Judge Caba-niss and endeavored to induce the lat-conference with Superior Judge Cabaniss and endeavored to induce the latter to become a candidate for Mayor. Cabaniss has proved himself a great vote-getter, but his aspirations run along judicial lines and he has declined the somewhat doubtful honor.

Flannery has expressed as his personal opinion that Dr. Leland, the present Coroner, is too light timber for the Mayoralty, and has gone in search of someone eise. In fact, Flannery is reported to be negotiating with his once political adversary, Frank J. Sullivan, and may induce him to serve. If so, the pair can be depended upon to give Phelan and Rudolph Spreckels a hard fight. Sullivan is "sore" at Brother-in-law Phelan, because he was removed as attorney for the Mutual Savings Bank, of which Phelan is a strong factor, and consequently he is fitching for a fight. for a fight.

In certain circles there is consider able glee expressed over the fact that while Roosevelt has gone his way, Ben-jamin Ide Wheeler, president of the University of California, has been cast in the discard, as far as being an as-sistant to the Executive of the United States is concerned. It is declared by those who do not fancy the sometimes dictatorial stands of Wheeler that for the last seven years he has come to be known in Washington as the Third Sen-ator from California. It is said that at the White House so it is alleged, he was a confidential emissary of Rossevelt in the politics of California, a sort of private smelling committee or secret service agent, to find out things to be service agent, to find out things to be whispered in the President's ear.

Now it is different, His services are to be dispensed with. His position is abolished. Therefore the president of the state university will not be required to run to Washington three or four times a year to tell the President of the United States all about it.

ture is after the slot machines. A bill The toiling gas meter in just now the has already passed the House of Representatives prohibiting the use of slot machines for gambling or betting, and is so stringent that it makes it a misde-meanor for a person or firm to buy, sell or have in possession a slot machine. The slot-machine craze has reached the acute stage in San Francisco. It is no longer a question of winning cigars, but a gambling proposition out and out. In fact, there are hundreds of so-called cigar stores scattered over the city where but a few of the poorest makes of cigars are kept, and the winnings paid in coin. On these machines, there, are in fact, all sorts of gambling seems to be a craze with the average San Fran-ciscan. Every cigar store is, as well, a place where you can make a bet on the es. Any contribution, from 25 cents will be accepted by the cigar-store drooms. The racetrack, naturally, has been against this thing, but they haven't been able to stamp it out. A clerk or any man who wants to make a bet on races and simply can't get away to the races and simply can't get away to go to the track, telephones his cigar store or walks into the place and says that he wants to place 50 cents or $1 as the case may be, on a certain horse. That's all there is to it. The poslroom agent makes a record of the bet, but no paper is passed between the player and the bet taker. If the horse wins, he comes back and gets his money. This, of course, is not a new custome in the of course, is not a new custom in the olty, but one that is to be deployed. It has educated all sorts of people to the bettling habit. Even women are flends on racetrack gambling, through the me-dlum of the cigar stand, and no one knows just how much money is wagered every day the racetrack is open at

The latest gambling story is to the effect that a systematic effort to organize the gambling interests in Chinatown is being made by two wealthy Chinese, who propose to operate a string of gambling houses and lottery games in this city. Secret meetings have been held and the promoters of the syndicate are endeavoring to secure from the local gamblers an initial subscription of $85,000 with which they propose to secure per-mission to operate their games on a large subject of a rigid investigation by the San Francisco Board of Supervisors. The trouble started as far back as January, when the gas bills commenced to run when the gas bills commenced to run enormously high. All over the city there were complaints that the bills had dou-bled. The public declared that while it had protested to the Gas Company, the only reply was a threat to remove the meters, if there were more processequently, the daily newspapers, appreciating that it would be a popular cause, started booming the cry for investigation. The matter came before the Supervisors, and the demands were so inpervisors, and the two experts, under the delegated to pervisors, and the demands were so in-sistent that the two experts, under the pay of the city, have been delegated to look for the cause. It is premised that there will be some relief for the users of gas in San Francisco, and in the meantime, the residents are holding tight and doing the best they can.

The bungalow here illustrated is not an expensive one, considering that it stands about 32 one, considering that it stands about at feet by 80 feet on the ground and has a living room 17 feet by 30 feet; a dining-room 18 feet square, large bedroom, a cozy den with seat and built-in book-cases, six closets, not including the kitchen and dining-room closets and cupboards. As here shown, the house is constructed almost entirely of wood and should cost ilmost entirely of wood and should cost complete about $2000. It has been built with broken atone porch front and chimney, hardwood floors, etc., for $2500. Among its many taking features are the old-fashioned china closets in the dining-room on either side of a wide double win-dow with seat and locker; the lavatory and coat closet, opening between the der and the front bedroom; the very complete and convenient cabinet kitchen; the bathroom opening from both bedrooms and hall; two linen closets, one in the bath-room and one at the end of the hall, etc. The living room has beamed ceiling and broad mantel and fireplace; the diningroom has high paneled wainscot with

Second Tingle Treatise on Cakes

BY LILIAN TINGLE. (Cake Lesson No. 2.) ROPORTIONS of ingredients—it is not possible to give an absolutely exact proportion of the various ingredients that will always be true of all cakes; but there are general principles to be observed in all cake receipts, and any one with a knowledge of these general principles and "type" cakes can usually recognize a "type" recipe even though disguised in fractional quantities, and, with a little practice, can distinguish in print as well as in the mouth, a good cake from a poor one.

An English editor's wife once made an musing confession to me. Her husband had allowed her to try her hand on the "Woman's Column." Asked how she was getting on she replied naively, "splendidly, thank you. You know I do know how to dress—every one admits that, so I write mostly about clothes. And, for a change, when I can't think of anything else, I write; 'Here is a perfectly delicious cake which I tasted at Lady So-and-So's the other day,' and I fling together some suother day, and I filing together some sugar and butter and eggs and flour and things—you do put those into cake, don't you? and say 'mix in the usual way, bake in a moderate oven and decorate with any pretty frosting.' But I'm sorry for any woman who tries to make those 'delicious cakes,' for I never made one in my life and scarcely ever est cake, anyway, one has to consider one's bits these way, one has to consider one's bits. way, one has to consider one's hips these days, but I know there are women who are always clamoring for new cake recipes, so I try to give them what they want. You must admit the novelty and originality of mine."

She gave me some specimens to read. They looked plausible enough to the cas-ual eye, though no one but a novice would have attempted to follow them. The novice would probably say things about "bad luck," and give the product decent burial in the garbage pail, away from the scornful eyes of her friends and family. Standard proportions for a few "type" cakes will be given in a future lesson. The types tend, of course, to shade one into another, but in general the following will be found true of good recipes for cakes containing shortening.

Cakes That Take Shortening.

1.—Not more butter than one-third the volume of flour, except in rich pound cakes, where one-half may be used, 2.—From one-half to two-thirds the volume of flour in sugar, with a general tendency towards increase of sugar with diminished butter, until in cakes where no butter is used, you reach the point of having equal volumes of flour and sugar, as in rich sponge and angel cakes. In dealing with recipes by weight it should be remembered that equal bulks of gran-ulated (not powdered) sugar and of but-ter weigh about the same; and that an equal bulk of sifted flour is about half the weight of either, as shown by the

2 cups solid butter—1 pound. 2 cups granulated sugar—1 pound. 2 cups eggs—1 pound. 4 cups sifted flour—1 pound.

2 cups eggs—1 pound.

4 cups sifted four—1 pound.

2.—The liquid is usually about half the volume of flour. Eggs and butter each being reckoned as having half-value as "liquid;" since the butter melts in the oven, and the eggs stiffen. Hence the "plainer" the cake, as to butter and eggs, the more milk or water is called for, the stiffer the batter will be when mixed, and the more baking powder, or its equivalent, will be required. In the rich old-fashioned "pound cake," where the rule called for "a pound of everything," no baking powder at all was used, and no liquid, except the butter and eggs and the "wineglassful of brandy" which was added for flavor and to improve the cake's keeping properties. As a rule the richer the cake, the more difficult it is, in most families, to keep it, while most of the plainer types need to be fresh—in some cases almost warm, in order to be palatable. The student of cake-making will do well to make a sort of table of the recipes she knows, reducing each to a common base, as, say, "to every cup of flour" and noting the relative proportions of each ingredient and how they follow the rules laid down. She should also note the change of character due to increase of butter or sugar in the texture of the cake.

i—As regards baking powder, or its equivalents, it will be noted that for a mixture where the proportion of egg to flour is more than one to every cup (by measure as 1:4; by weight, as 1:2) not more than one level teaspoon of baking powder should be required, the amount decreasing until in pound cake (as 1:2) by measure or as 1:1 by weight the baking powder disappears entirely, or increasing, as the cake becomes plainer, until in an eggless, or almost eggless, cake, two leved teaspoons of baking powder will be called for with every cup to increase of butter or sugar in the texture of the cake.

4—As regards baking powder, or its equivalents, it will be noted that for a mixture where the proportion of egg to flour is more than one to every cup (by measure, as 1:4; by weight, as 1:2) not more than one level teaspoon of baking spowder should be required, the amount decreasing until in pound cake (as 1:2) by measure or as 1:1 by weight) the baking powder disappears entirely, or increasing, as the cake becomes plainer, until in an eggless, or almost eggless, cake, two leved teaspoons of baking powder will be called for with every cup of flour. Too much baking powder makes a coarse-grained, quickly drying cake. As for baking powder substitutes, a good rule to remember is the following: (a) three to four level teaspoons baking powder are equal in leavenin power to one level teaspoon soda with sufficient acid to neutralize it.

5.—One teaspoon soda may be completely neutralized by two teaspoons cream of tartar, or one teaspoon tartaric acid, or two cups sour milk, or one cup molasses. This is only, of course, approximately.

two cups sour milk, or one cup molasses. This is only, of course, approximately, not absolutely true, since the chemical changes take place in definite proportions by weight, and we use unscientific measurements of varying or weight, and ingredients of varying purity. But it is a good working guide and enables us to see how and when we

Making Ginger-Bread.

Take, for instance, a ginger-break recipe calling for one cap molasses and one cup sour milk to two and one-half cups flour. It is obvious that one and one-half teaspoons soda should be about right for this. Suppose we use water instead of sour milk, then we should slightly scant the measure (since sour milk, like blood, is thicker than water) and while using the same amount of soda, we should add one teaspoon cream of tartar to take the place of the acid in one cup sour milk. cipe calling for one cap molasses and one

Or, if we had no cream of tartar handy, Or, it we had no cream of tartar hands, we could use one teaspoon soda for the molasses, and an amount of baking powder equivalent to one-half tenspoon soda plus one tenspoon cream of tartar, i.e., from one and one-half to two teaspoons according to kind and quality of baking nowder.
