On a Sea of Mud. The Spectator (Portland). Irrepressible mud-squitter that he is, Mayor Lane is devoting the last few days of his bad administration to shooting his nasty streams of innuendo, abuse, suspicion and calumny against all whom his fair promises could not control and his threats could not coerce. He covers up evidences of graft on every side; but he has not convicted any grafters. In every contract, he finds connivance, collusion, and corruption, but none of his guilty is either on trial or wearing stripes. From "reliable men," whose names he either has forgot or is not at liberty to give, he hears stories of fraud and deceit in city business, and rushes to the papers with them, where they create an hour's sensation, and then give way to another discovery of dishonesty. But there are no convictions; just mud.

The Close of the First Week of Our Great

Removal Sale

marked one of the most satisfactory experiences possible to a young growing firm: Customers thronged our store all the week, finding everything just as represented, evidently more than pleased to see our carefully selected, exclusively designed garments selling at such positive reductions—many at half price, many less—and right at the opening of the season, too.

The sale continues. Each day garments fresh from their wrappings take the place of those sold. We have nothing handled, common, or cheap-looking—no "sale goods." Everything is at its best—and going at the lowest possible prices to make way for the coming move into large handsome quarters soon to be ready at 400 Washington street (cor. 10th).

We thank you for your generous patronage of the past week, and invite your further visits for the week to come.
