ENGLAND UNABLE TO FIGHT REVOLT

Assassination of Sir Curzon
Wyllie Shows How Subtle
Is Indian Campaign.

KRISHNAVARMA HEADS PLOT

Astute Oriental, With Headquarters in Paris, Directs Great Movement Designed to Drive
British Out.

LONDON, July 31.—(Special.)—The assassination of Sir William Curzon Wyllie by the Indian student Dhinra has opened the eyes of all England to the dangerous condition of affairs existing in the Indian Empire. Every effort is being made to ascertain whether the murderer acted on his own initiative or as the agent of conspirators. The documents found upon the prisoner and in his lodgings throw no light on this problem. Apart from native newspapers in which treason is openly advocated, the incriminating documents are in Dhinra's own writing. These letters and manifestoes show clearly that the engineering student had fallen under the influence of men not only in India, but also in Europe, who exert every effort and employ every means to poison the minds of the youth of India.

Dhinra accepted as his leaders men who in Europe profess peaceful agitation, and who in India urge treason. In India these men are leaders of parties so small that they would be insignificant and incapable of harm were it not for the support, moral and financial, that they receive from some native Princes. The names of these Princes are known to the government. One of them not many weeks ago, explaining his position at a London dinner table, remarked: "I wonder if ever I shall return to England after I leave this time. I doubt if the government would let me—if they knew." The government knows, but cannot act upon its knowledge.

Englishmen today are more interested in Shyamaji Krishnavarma than in almost any other living individual. At present he is living in Paris, and he will plot revolt and incite murder, retail and wholesale, so long as a governing Englishman remains in India. And Englishmen have helped him to this end. So far his best friends have been his hated enemies. The British permitted him to organize his conspiracy effectively and untrammelled, allowed him and his associates to come and go without question while they prepared a dose of terror to be administered on their own footsteps. India is remote, and assassinations there have had but little effect on the English heart.

"Well, then," says Krishnavarma, "we will kill them at home. India is governed from London—we will kill them in London."
Early last December, while interviewing Krishnavarma at his headquarters on the outskirts of Paris, a distinguished French editor was informed of the Indian's conspiracy to drive the British from India. "Look here," said the arch-conspirator, as he held up a small printed sheet, little larger than a master program. "This is what is frightening England." The sheet was the Indian Sociologist, a monthly paper, printed in English by an English firm in England, for several years circulating in India, untrammelled among the Indian students in London, and until recently widely distributed in India.

Krishnavarma was born in the year of the Indian mutiny. His complexion is swarthy, he is a man of great stature, and he dresses like a clergyman. His black hair and beard are well streaked with white, and his lips are snappy and pertinacious. His study is burdened with books and papers lying around in apparent great disorder, but a wonderful memory trained in his youth by Brahmin priests enables him to place his finger immediately on any quotation or manuscript required. His early training was among the ancient Indian lines. Later he made a special study of Sanscrit, which he read and wrote perfectly before he was 20 years of age. In 1878 he was appointed assistant professor of Sanscrit at Oxford, and became the first Indian M. A. at that university. The Secretary of State for India sent him to the Oriental Congress at Berlin as official delegate, and on returning to India he held office as Prime Minister successively in three Indian states. This is the man who today is the implacable enemy of England.

"I would have begun my work for the emancipation of India much sooner," he said during a recent conversation, "but for one fact. I regarded Herbert Spencer as my master. If I had organized openly for the freedom of India during his life, it would have been sad that his teachings were responsible, and much unpleasantness might have attended his old age in consequence. Almost immediately after his death I laid my plans, and the seed sown will be harvested soon."
The prophecy has been fulfilled, and the "harvest" has begun. After the murder of Sir Curzon Wyllie Krishnavarma declared that it was extremely unfair that he should be held to be in any respect responsible for this tragedy. There was, he argued, no more logic in such a proceeding than there would be in holding a newspaper responsible for a crime committed by a person who had read therein an account of a similar crime. He was a disciple of Herbert Spencer, and everything that he had written in the "Indian Sociologist" was based on his works and on those of other English authorities on such matters.

To one or two passages of his writing he drew special attention in support of his contention. In this month's number of his review, in an article headed "International Law and the Ethics of Force," the following passage occurs:
"A brief statement of our case. At the risk of alienating the sympathies and good opinion of almost all our old friends and acquaintances in England, and of some of our past helpmates in India, we repeat that political assassination is not murder, and that the rightful employment of physical force connotes force used defensively against force used aggressively," as aptly expressed by the late Hon. Auberon Herbert in his Herbert Spencer lecture at Oxford in 1904."
