

SCENES IN THE PALPITATING
HEART OF THE GAY
FRENCH CAPITAL,
THE MECCA OF ALL AMERICANS

digestion, sleeplessness and melancholy. The New York physician considers it a medical discovery.

"You cannot sit at one of these sidewalk tables without taking the air, nor watching the human river, however listlessly, without catching interest in the ways and cadences of its multitude; or calming the nerves. The gale of pleasure-seekers is contagious, and insomnia seems to be peculiarly benefited by an irregular waking of the nerve centers."

The Boulevard soothes everything—even suspicion. This is as good an explanation as the French can give. It is so because there has been nothing pale mauve in the confidence of Mr. Cook. When, guidebook in hand, before the architecture of the Hotel de Ville, he got into conversation with a well-dressed man who said he was Mr. Douglas, editor of a New Zealand paper.

On their way to the spot where Marie Antoinette was guillotined, they met a friend of Mr. Douglas, presented as Mr. Spencer, of Philadelphia. He gave them a drink to the Bois.

Up to this moment all was usual tourist amenities. Next day, young Mr. Cook took his first walk up the terrace of a Boulevard cafe. In the peaceful ease they watched the charming spectacle of the great easy-going throng.

"Why could we not do this at home?" they asked. "It is delightful to sit on the sidewalk!"

"That man has dropped his pocket-book," exclaimed Mr. Spencer.

Young Mr. Cook hastily picked it up. He was about to give it to the stranger, when Spencer, to make sure, turned it over to him, received him to tell his contents.

"Two diamond rings, two diamond drops, other jewels and several European banknotes, were enclosed here."

The grateful stranger, John Corcoran, sat with the Americans upon the Boulevard and took a pale rose drink.

But young Mr. Cook insisted that he buy Vichy water with a pale blue syrup in it.

"Flavor of sweet plums," he says.

He was the swiftest player.

Corcoran was on his way to Rome to administer one of the last requests of an uncle. Complimenting young Cook on his bonnet, Mr. Cook offered him a position as agent in America on a guaranteed commission of $10,000. Seeing that young Mr. Cook hesitated, Corcoran told him to go. He could send him the pocket book, which would have made him a millionnaire, while he left for a moment on business.

... that recognized neither St. Is. of France and some had commissions at St. Philip and Bourbon streets than I paid due attention to the accounts of Gulf of Mexico or, perhaps, in any other, chants were threatened with bankruptcy, error, but he was neither. Instead he can for Laiffite that the gallant pirate and his companions were set free. Laiffite and his legal defenders to Barataria, a glorious banquet in honor of the victor. At this banquet, they were to give their fee. Grymes attended, but Laiffite declined. Instead he commended his friend to collect the $20,000 and gave 30 per cent of the fee to him for trouble. For one week Grymes attended the princely hospitality of the chief. Never did man fare more handsomely, when he returned to Orleans he had no money. He received $30,000 from Laiffite, but, said to

(Concluded on Page 6.)