

LAND OF THE NEW RAILROAD

Promised Attractions for the Settler and the Pleasure Seeker When the Cars Start Running

IRRIGATED FIELD IN THE BEND COUNTRY, SHOWING CONTRAST WITH UNTOUCHED
SAGE BRUSH LANDS

BY GEORGE PALMER PUTNAM
THE railroads, passing through the Bend country, will be surrounded by some scenic features unique on any Western road.

Most curious of these are the strange lava fields and flows some 10 miles south of Bend. Here is found an old-time volcano, almost perfect in its conformation, and wonderfully interesting in its surroundings. The long extinct fire-maker, known as Lava Butte, is shaped like a cone, in whose top has been punched out a great circular depression, the crater of yore. In this crater and clinging on the steep side of the miniature mountain, are large pine trees, bearing evidence by their growth, of the great antiquity of the natural freak which supports them.

In the formation of its almost perpendicular slopes, composed, for the most part, of loose disintegrated lava and volcanic ash, the isolated butte reminds the climber strikingly of Vesu-vius. For if the imagination is able to picture the smoke emitted from crevasses and the necessary surrounding scenery, the resemblance of this Oregon lava pile to the final cone of Italy's everlasting active chimney, is little short of remarkable.

The proximity of a climable extinct and highly picturesque volcano, in addition to the attractions of scaling the neighboring snow-covered peaks with its accompaniment of exhilarating excitement, will no doubt lead an aided zealot of pleasure to the repetoire offered by this new land to the experience-seeking traveler.

A matter of probable interest to natural historians and others interested in the curious, even if it be one that up to the present lacks authentic proof, is the statement advanced concerning the peculiar and unduplicated species of animals who inhabited this crater of Lava Butte in the days of the Indians and vast sectional possibilities.

Those who should know declare that these animals were constructed on peculiar lines, as we reckon animal architecture since the teachings of Long and Thompson-Seton have been diffused through the land. This peculiarly consisted in the fact that two of their legs were some six inches shorter than their mates on the opposite side, so that they might the more readily navigate the extremely steep sides of the volcano in their journeys to and from their dwellings in the crater at the top. By this happy provision of nature they were able to keep their bodies in a horizontal position even while they climbed up the steep grade in corkerew fashion. These remarkable unbalanced quadrupeds were known as Lavalops, from the fact of their inhabiting the volcanic apartments, and because of their peculiar gait when progressing on level ground.

Those who may have the temerity to doubt the existence of these peculiar animals need only pay Lava Butte a curious visit in order to obtain ocular proof of the authenticity of the legend.

For climbing the steep slopes, to this very day remain the countless trails of the "unusual steps" (to borrow a classic fragment from Virgil's description of Aeneas' flight with An-chises) of the long departed Lavalops.

Out from the base of the butte to the north and west stretch the ocean-like, turbulent fields of lava, a flow speeded from the entrails of the earth thousands of years before Columbus encouraged the first immigration of undesirable foreigners.

Unless it be the species of that political article, W. I. Bryan, there is nothing in the world so exhausting as the attempt to traverse these lava flows. Imagine, if you can, wave after wave of crumbling, wildly distorted rock, separated by chasms and innumerable miniature canyons of unexpected dimensions and direction, small creeks ready to sprain the ankles and cut sues to pieces, and large boulder masses to intercept the way, petrified whirls of seething and once molten liquid, now all petrified and jumbled together, without rhyme or reason into the present-day lava fields. Without doubt it is the "corneriest" territory in creation for pedestrianism, and a profanity-producer in inverse ratio.

The survey of the Hill road at this time runs directly over these lava flows, between the peculiar volcano and the foaming Deschutes. With the slight understanding the foregoing description may have given of the joys of exploring the lava, it can readily be understood that the making of the survey across it was no Summer holiday.
In fact, the surveyor in charge of the party sprained his ankle in the process of prospecting possible routes.

The wise ones who fill their limitless time making predictions of future development, forecast that Conco Island and Council Creek will be back numbers once the development of "Volcano Park" is undertaken. Its possibilities are delightful to contemplate. They may be made to include a subterranean trip to the lava caves, a "wonder ride" in the crater depths, or even a dramatic "chute the chute" excursion from the volcano top to the waters of the Deschutes. But even without these additional the tourist of the future will find ample to interest him in the unique surroundings of the butte.

Like-wise, in the 30-odd miles of future road from Bend southward the unimproved attractions supplied by nature will delight the traveler.

To the west, rising from the rolling foothill timber lands, he will see the ever snow-clad summits of the Cascades, as imposing a sky line as is often encountered. The minaret peaks of Sears, Siskiyou, Mount Hood, and Jack, Washington, Jefferson, and the other impressive summits of the massive divide will be the crowning feature of the scenic journey.

More intimate will be the traveler's acquaintance with the Deschutes, along whose banks for many miles the trains will hurry him. There will be glimpses of the cascades and pools which will awaken every appreciate sense of beauty.

And if the journeyer be a devotee of the rod and reel, his fate is settled; for the help of his two brothers, set to work to build another farm from the mountain wilderness.

It was under such conditions that he lived and worked from early morning until late at night. Naturally, there was no time to attend school. As he had not learned to read or write when a child, he was entirely ignorant of the first rudiments of education when he married and built a home for himself and his bride on a corner of the new farm.

As he began to prosper financially, he felt the need of an education, and on the advice of an acquaintance, purchased a small dictionary, a "blue back" speller and a Davis arithmetic on his next trip to town. It was a tedious task that he had mapped out for himself, but he had learned the lessons of patience and perseverance in the hard school of experience, and nothing discouraged him.

severance in the hard school of experience, and nothing discouraged him.

severance in the hard school of experience, and nothing discouraged him.
