Nonpartisan Movement Feared.

During the meeting several brief addresses were delivered by local orators, noteworthy among them being George M. Brown, District Attorney, who, in one of his famous talks, declared him-self more afraid of the so-called nonpartisanship movement than of the Democratic party. "This non-partisanship cry is spreading with all rapidity," he said. "and we must check it soon or it will become a staple issue. You will always find the Democrats yelling about non-partisanship. Why? Because they are of the minority party." Mr. Brown's remarks brought down the hause and he was forced to respond upon three occasions during the afternoon. Other orators who spoke were
