STEAMSHIP LINES CANNOT PREVENT INCIDENTS LIKE GAYNOR SHOOTING

Companies Frankly Say It Is Impossible to Take Precautions Because American Public Won't Stand Restrictions—Crusade on Short Weights Success—Peculiar Perils of Jersey Conductors.

NEW YORK, Aug. 20.—(Special.)—The steamship companies have taken no extra precautions since the shooting of Mayor Gaynor, and the officials of the big liners are frank enough to say that there is nothing they can do under the circumstances. Mayor Gaynor was attacked on a boat of the North German Lloyd Line. This company, strange to say, is the only one that ever attempted to restrict visitors, and it was compelled to give it up.

"We found very speedily," said one of the officials, "that the American public will not stand for being prevented from saying good bye to its friends. Our regulation met with a storm of disapproval, and we speedily withdrew it. Otherwise we should have found our passenger business dropping off to a great extent."

"It was suggested that tickets of admission be distributed through the passengers, but the objection to that is that many unexpected visitors drop in at the last moment. All we or any other line can do, is to adopt a reasonable amount of precaution, and trust to luck."

As it is at present, it is almost impossible for a suspicious-looking character to board one of the big ocean liners. The visitor must pass the scrutiny of the gatekeeper, of the elevator man, a guard stationed at the head of the gangplank, and the officer at the head of it. Besides there are always detectives hustling around.

Nothing Likely to Be Done.

Any one of these men is likely to ask the caller who he wants to see, and unless a satisfactory answer is given, the visitor stands a good chance of being put out. Gallagher, the Mayor's assassin, was a man of respectable appearance, and there was no apparent reason why he should have been excluded.

Officials of the different lines all say that they are willing to amend their rules if some feasible plan is suggested, and every company will abide by them. The chances are, however, that nothing will be done, and it is hard to see what could be required.

It is pointed out that the Mayor was a man who never took any precautions. He walked to and from his house every day, rain or shine. Police Commissioner Baker often urged him to have a guard accompany him, but the Mayor laughed at him.

"The surest way to find trouble is to look for it," he said, and thus dismissed the matter from his mind.

The crusade against short weight and incorrect measurements is moving along on the high road of success. The new city inspectors, under the spur of energetic chief, Clement Driscoll, who was formerly a newspaper reporter, are making many arrests. In every case, too, they "have the goods."

One of the most flagrant offenses was told in court the other day. A driver for the trust delivered a load of ice at a restaurant, and with it a slip, showing that the purchaser was indebted to the company for 4230 pounds of frozen water. Then Driscoll swooped down upon him, and re-weighed the stuff. He found that it was 1130 pounds short.

Man Who Saved Lincoln Dies.

As the magistrate said, a man who has to pay for a half a ton of phatom ice each day, has a perfect right to kick. And ice is very high this year.

J. B. Allen, who died the other day, has as his epitaph "The Man Who Turned the Tide for Lincoln." And he is entitled to it.

Allen, in the days before the Civil War, was a power in politics in the old Ninth ward. He was a delegate to the Republican National Convention in 1860, and, with his associates from the Empire State, voted on several ballots for William H. Seward.

On the concluding ballot, the announcement of a solid New York vote for Seward had been made, when Allen took the floor, entered objection, and voted for Lincoln. The split in Seward's own state had its effect on other delegations, there was a rush to get on the band wagon, and Lincoln was nominated.

Allen was never active in politics after that, nor did he amass money in business, and simply dropped out of sight. Only the fact that he died, recalled the man who certainly had a great deal to do, in a humble way, with making American history.

Jersey trolley car conductors recently struck for an increase in pay and got it. Although it did not figure in their list of grievances, it is a fact that traction employees in the state across the river are exposed to unique perils.

One conductor was standing on the running board of a car near Hackensack, while the car was running through a dark wood. He did not see a cow, which was almost on the right of way. He felt it, however, for the cow brushed him off the car, just as if he had been a fly.

Conductor Hooked in Trousers.

In Newark a man was driving a wagon along one of the side streets. On the wagon was a pole, and on the end of the pole a long hook. The hook caught in the trousers of Conductor Albert Sayres, who was on a passing car, and Sayres left his post of duty. Dangling like a fish, he accompanied the wagon down the street a block before his cries brought relief.

Senator Jonathan Bourne has been with us for a few days, presumably on a political mission. He has called on Roosevelt, and maintains an air of dark mystery.

The peculiar thing is that while the New York papers show absolutely no interest in Bourne's "mission," they are all frankly interested in his clothes, and have published articles of greater or less length on the subject. For example, the American says:

"Senator Bourne, in the course of a few hours, established a reputation as a pattern of sartorial elegance in the lobby of the Belmont, and his suit of thin white material, claret colored tie, and wide brimmed Panama hat, with the brim turned up on the side, were envied by all who saw."

The morning Telegraph takes the matter up editorially, and after calling Bourne "a typical Westerner, one of the plumpers of far away Oregon," says the Senator thus tributed:

"If all Westerners dressed like Mr. Bourne, the Eastern men would have to go to Oregon for their styles."

All of which should, of course, make everybody in Oregon very proud and happy.

Many strange persons drift into New York in the course of a year, but the reporters are convinced that the Maharajah of Mourhand is in a class by himself.

Maharajah Like Colonel.

During his stay in New York he gave out interviews on every conceivable subject with the rapidity of a Roosevelt. He was always on hand when wanted, and would discuss the most American subjects in a most East Indian way.

Among the matters on which he was quoted at length were the following:

The difference between the police force of Mourhand and that of New York; how the shooting of Mayor Gaynor could have been prevented; a condemnation of women gamblers, particularly those at Narragansett Pier; unqualified praise of the roof garden style of entertainment for the Summer months; a defense of moving-pictures (he calls them jumping pictures); a critical analysis of our school system; the evident extravagance of our home life; the Nation's amazing failure to curb the trusts; and some remarks on the peril of race suicide.

Whether the Maharajah really talked on all the subjects that he is said to have done is another question. But, anyway, he was "good copy," and the newspaper men and the "Sob Sisters" were sorry to see him sail en route for his home in India.

Policeman Henry Wolf, of the West 15th-street station, is the most indignant member of the local force. He started on his annual vacation the other day, and the next morning appeared a story that he had inherited $125,000 from a relative in Germany.

Wolf was found at his home, vanishing a floor. For he expects to spend his vacation putting his "home to rights."

"Damn those fellows at the station-house," he remarked bitterly, "every time I go away on a vacation they spring something like that on me just to have fun."

"Do you think I would be here if there were a fortune coming to me? Somebody else would be manufacturing this floor, son. If I ever thought that I had a relative member of the local force.
