HANGMAN TO SHOPKEEPER. Crippen's Executioner Matter-of-Fact Man in Everyday Life.

LONDON, Dec. 24.—(Special.)—Crippen's executioner, John Ellis, the hangman, when not engaged in the gruesome business of hurrying a criminal into the next world, runs a small retail store in Rochdale.

The hangman, a modest and unassuming citizen, speaks of crimes with a certain amount of reserve, but he accepts the fatal part he plays in terminating an assassin's career as a matter of course, and shaves his customers with as firm a hand after an execution as he does before it. He has assisted at more than 60 executions, and has personally carried out six himself. Experts on this side agree that hanging is a more painless method of execution than electrocution. From the moment a condemned man leaves his cell to his death is about 25 seconds. The condemned man is run across the court from his cell to the place of execution, the cap is placed on his head, gages fastened to his hands and feet, the slipknot put round his neck, and the platform he stands upon is released more quickly than it takes to describe the process.

Some curious stories occasionally leak out about the demeanor of prisoners on the scaffold. Palmer, the poisoner, for instance, imparted a ghastly touch of humor to his execution. He was particularly about his appearance, and flatly refused to cross the prison courtyard in the rain. "Look here," he said to the warders, "I shall get my feet wet."

All matters affecting prisoners are under the control of the Home Office, and petitions for reprieve are addressed to the Home Secretary. Such a petition went to Winston Churchill on Crippen's behalf, but as events proved, it was not effective.
