CHILDREN TAKE GREAT INTEREST IN THEIR SCHOOL GARDEN PLOTS

Portsmouth, Holladay, Brooklyn, Buckman and Woodlawn Schools and Several Others Have Their Plots of Ground in Which Busy Workers May Be Seen Early and Late, Flying Spade and Rake.

Portsmouth School Garden, Turning The Rows

Woodlawn Garden

INTEREST of the children in the public schools seems to associate everything that they encounter in their daily work with the school gardening work, which has come to be one of the most important things in their day's work, in the estimation of the majority of the school children. Numberless amusing incidents occurring in the schools every day, show how large the school garden looms in the mind of the average pupil.

During a class in manual training at a certain school last week a young student of Oriental extraction stained his hands generously as well as the wood with which he was working. He asked the instructor how to get it off, and was told he would probably have to wear it off. He said he did not understand how that was to be done, whereupon a very small boy spoke up and volunteered the following: "Come up to the school garden this afternoon and we will show you how."

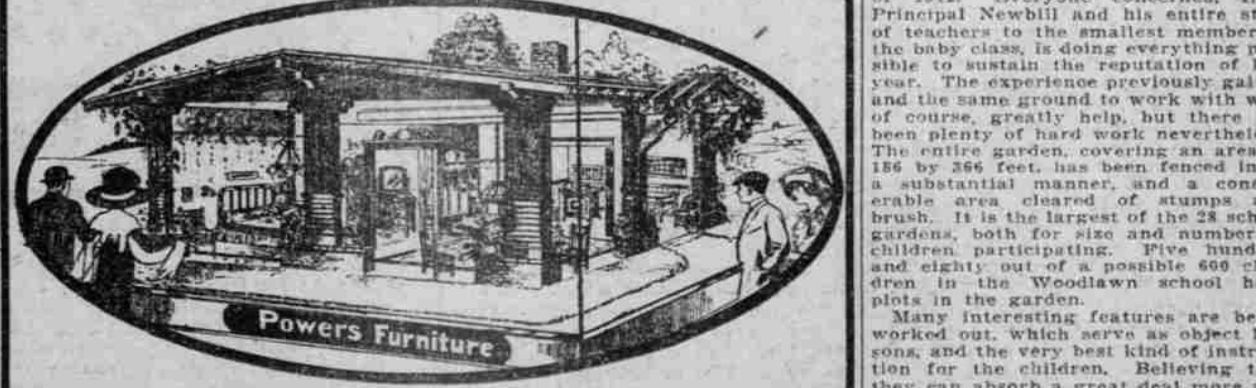

As one journey to Portsmouth or Holladay School have a very pretty garden 200x100 feet. It occupies a corner in laid out on a diagonal plan, with attractive flower beds at the corners and in the center. Principal A. M. Cannon personally supervised the work and took an interest in it.

At the Brooklyn School a handy vacant lot, 190 by 100 feet, adjoining the school property on the West, has been transformed into a combination flower and vegetable garden. A row of flower beds across the front, and also through the center form the letter "T." Sixty children have plots in this garden, including an organization known as the "Garden Blossom Girls," who have the letters "M. B. G." in flowers. Miss Dimick, the principal, is a strong believer in garden work for school children.

The Buckman School Garden at East Sixteenth and East Glisan streets occupies an area 132 by 54 feet, and 120 children are enrolled. It is off the beaten track of travel, being located on unimproved streets, but is well worth a visit. It is laid out in blocks of four plots each, plots being 6 by 20 feet. A large diagonal flower bed occupies the center. D. T. Vantine was one of the first principals to help the children this year, and has been aided by several teachers and residents of the district.

Interested persons declare that the Woodlawn School Garden this year will be even better than the prize garden of 1912. Everyone concerned, from Principal Newbill and his entire staff of teachers to the smallest member of the baby class, is doing everything possible to sustain the reputation of last year. The experience previously gained and the same ground to work with will, of course, greatly help, but there has been plenty of hard work nevertheless. The entire garden, covering an area of 186 by 266 feet, has been fenced in in a substantial manner, and a considerable area cleared of stumps and brush. It is the largest of the 28 school gardens, both for size and number of children participating. Five hundred and eighty out of a possible 600 children in the Woodlawn school have plots in the garden.

Many interesting features are being worked out, which serve as object lessons, and the very best kind of instruction for the children. Believing that they can absorb a great deal more and remember it with greater ease by actual observation, Newbill has supervised personally the planting of several gardens where nearly everything which can be grown in Oregon is being grown. First, there is the industrial garden, which includes all kinds of plants from which manufactured products are made, such as hemp, flax, cotton, sugar beets, brewer's barley, etc., also all kinds of plants which are used for stock feed, etc. 16 kinds of hay and grasses, 12 kinds of corn, including Kaffir, sweet, pop, sorghum, milo, maize and millet. Another garden contains all sorts of vegetables which can be grown in Western Oregon. Another large plot is called an Exchange Garden. Any child who has a surplus number of plants after thinning takes them to the Exchange Garden, where he can trade them to some other young gardener for something he may want. This is working out very slowly, as occasionally losses occur, either from insects or plant diseases.
